

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

LALÉE, a hamlet in the parish of Winterborne-Whitchurch, hundred of Comb's-ditch, Blandford division, co. of Dorset.

LALEHAM, a parish in the hundred of Spelthorne, co. of Middlesex. Living, a perpetual curacy, not in charge, in the archd. of Middlesex and dio. of London, and subordinate to the vicarage of Staines. The Thames abounds in fish at this place, and is much resorted to by anglers. The earl of Lonsdale has a handsome seat in the vicinity: the surrounding scenery is remarkably picturesque. Distance from Staines, 2½ m. S.S.E. Pop., in 1801, 372; in 1831, 588. A. P., £3,749.

LALESTON, a parish in the hundred of Newcastle, co. of Glamorgan, South Wales. The area is about 700 acres. Living, a curacy in the dio. of St David's and province of Canterbury, not in charge, returned at £17, and consolidated with the vicarage of Newcastle. The name is supposed to be derived from that of Lalys, chief architect to Henry I. of England, whom Grenville, lord of Neath, brought from the Holy Land in 1111. Distance from Bridgend, 3 m. E. This parish consists of the hamlets of Upper and Lower Laleston; the former of which contained, in 1831, 204, and the latter, 238 inhabitants. A. P., £1,423.

LAMARSH, a parish in the hundred of Hinckford, co. of Essex, bounded on the east by the navigable river Stour. Living, a rectory, in the jurisdiction of the bishop of London, in concurrence with the commissary of Essex and Hertford, rated at £12 0s. 2½d., and, in 1829, in the patronage of Henry Sperling, Esq. Church ded. to the Holy Innocents. Distance from Halsted, 6 m. N.E. by E. Pop., in 1801, 285; in 1831, 323. A. P., £1,715.

LAMBCROFT, a hamlet in the parish of Kelstern, Wold division of the hundred of Louth-Eske, parts of Lindsey, co. of Lincoln.

Distance from Louth, 4½ m. N.W. by W. Pop., in 1831, 34.

LAMBECCOTE, a hamlet in the parish of Ratcliffe-upon-Trent, southern division of the wapentake of Bingham, co. of Nottingham.

LAMBERHURST, a parish, partly in the hundred of Brencley and Horsemouden, lathe of Aylesford, co. of Kent, and partly in the hundred of Loxfield-Pelham, rape of Pevensey, co. of Sussex. Living, a vicarage in the archd. and dio. of Rochester, rated at £12 10s. 5d., and in the patronage of the dean and chapter of Rochester. Church ded. to St Mary. Fairs for cattle are held here on April 5th and May 21st. The Baptists have a meeting-house here. There were here very extensive iron-works, but they have been given up from a failure in the supply of ore. There remains a considerable portion of Scotney-castle, an ancient structure. The modern house of the same name stands close by, and was designed by Inigo Jones. The school has an endowment of £6, for poor children. Distance from Maidstone, 14 m. S.W. by S. Pop., in 1801, 1017; in 1831, 1521. A. P., £1,638.

LAMBETH, a parish, forming, with Southwark, one of the most extensive suburbs of London, situated in the eastern division of the hundred of Brixton, co. of Surrey. It lies on the banks of the Thames, opposite to Westminster, and covers an area 16 m. in circumference. It is bounded by the parishes of Newington, Butts, Camberwell, Stratham, Clapham, Croydon, Christ-church, and St George, and by the river Thames; and is divided into four liberties, containing the Bishop's, Prince's, Vauxhall, Kennington, Lambeth-marsh, Lambeth-wall, Stockwell, and Lambeth-dean precincts. It is crossed by the great road from London to Portsmouth, and by the new line of road from Waterloo-bridge to Newington. It was formerly famous for a mineral well, which has fallen into disuse; but Cuper's gardens, and especially Vauxhall, still retain their popularity. This parish also contains the Coburg theatre and Astley's amphitheatre; the former in the Waterloo road, the latter not far from Westminster-bridge. Here are two extensive water-works for supplying the inhabitants with water drawn from the Thames. The river is here crossed by the Waterloo, Westminster, and Vauxhall bridges.—By 3^d William IV. Lambeth, with the parish of St Mary Newington, and the parish of St Giles Camberwell, except the manor and hamlet of Dulwich, returns two members to parliament. The number of electors is above 16,400. The returning officer is to be appointed annually by the sheriff of Surrey.—In the reign of King John, a weekly market and a fair for 15 days were granted, but they have been allowed to fall into disuse. The parish is included within the bills of mortality of the metropolis, and within the limits of the new police establishment. It is subject to the jurisdiction of a court of pleas, held at Southwark, for the recovery of debts under £5. The streets are in general paved, and lighted with gas. The inhabitants are employed in various branches of manufactures. The most important manufactories are iron foundries, distilleries, breweries, potteries, patent shot factories, engine factories, chemical works, and glass works; many others of less importance are too numerous to be mentioned. Coal, lime, and timber, are landed at numerous wharfs on the Thames.

The Palace.—The chief building in the parish is Lambeth palace, the residence of the archbishops of Canterbury. The manor originally belonged to the see of Rochester, having been conferred on it by the sister of Edward the Confessor. In the palace of the bishops of Rochester, many metropolitan councils were held, in particular, that which Archbishop Anselm convoked in 1100, to consider the propriety of the marriage of Henry I. with Maud, daughter of the king of Scotland, who had taken the veil, but had not yet taken the vows of a nun. There is reason to believe that the archbishops of Canterbury had a dwelling here at that period. About the year 1189, Baldwin, archbishop of Canterbury, obtained the manor and palace from the bishop of Rochester in exchange for other lands, at which time the buildings appear to have been old and mean. The ancient possession of Lambeth by the see of Rochester is still commemorated by the payment to the latter, in two half-yearly sums of five marks of silver, in consideration of the lodging, fire-wood, forage, and other accommodations which the bishops of Rochester had been accustomed to receive when they visited London. Bishop Tanner says: "Baldwin, archbishop of Canterbury, being obliged to desist building a college for secular canons at Hakinton near Canterbury, thought he might pursue a design of that nature at 40 or 50 miles' distance, and accordingly began, about 1191, to found a fine chapel here, which he intended to make collegiate, and to endow for the maintenance of several canons or prebendaries, to the honour of St Thomas the Martyr. This his successor Archbishop Hubert carried on; but when it was just finished, A. D. 1199, he was forced to pull it down by the papal bulls, which had been obtained at the strong instance of the monks of Christ-church, Canterbury, who were jealous of this new foundation of seculars so near the archiepiscopal palace. This caused great difference between the archbishop and those monks; which, being put to reference, the arbitrators awarded that the archbishop might, here at Lambeth, or anywhere but on the foundation of the former chapel, found an ordinary church, and place therein not less than thirteen or more than twenty Premonstratensian canons, and endow the same with £100 per annum. But this last proposal doth not appear to have taken effect." In the 13th century, several synods were held here by Archbishop Peckham; the most important of these was a general convocation of the bishops of the realm, to consider the condition of the Catholic church in England, the bishop of Hereford having made several complaints respecting it to the supreme jurisdiction at Rome. The palace was sacked and most of the furniture and records burned.

by the followers of Wat Tyler, in 1381. It was visited by Henry VII., Catharine of Aragon, and Queen Elizabeth; especially the last, who often remained here for several days, visiting Archbishops Parker and Whitgift. It was fortified in 1641 by Archbishop Laud, who had previous notice of an attack which was made by a large mob of puritans. After the fall of that primate, it was taken possession of by the house of commons, by whom it was used as a prison, and subsequently sold to Thomas Scot, one of the regicides, and Matthew Hardy. The archbishops again entered on possession of their property after the Restoration, and have never since been deprived of it. The palace, as it now appears, is an irregular but very extensive pile, exhibiting specimens of almost every style of architecture that has prevailed within the last 700 years. The oldest part of it is the chapel, which is supposed to have been erected towards the close of the 12th century. It is in the earliest style of English architecture, divided into two apartments by a richly ornamented screen of oak, and measuring 72 feet in length by 25 in breadth; the height is 30 feet. The windows on the sides are triple and lancet shaped, and the eastern window contains five lights; they were formerly filled with ancient stained glass, which was broken by order of the parliament, during the commonwealth. The roof is flat, and ornamented with the arms of several prelates. Under the chapel is another apartment, or crypt, of smaller dimensions, supported by finely groined pillars, and now used as a cellar, though in ancient times it may not improbably have served as a place of worship. "Another of the most remarkable portions of the edifice, the great hall, was originally erected by Archbishop Chicheley in the beginning of the reign of Henry VI.; but after the palace had been sold by the parliament, this magnificent apartment was pulled down. It was rebuilt, however, on the old site, and in close imitation of the former hall, after the Restoration, by Archbishop Juxon, at an expense of £10,500. It stands on the right of the principal court-yard, and is built of fine red brick, the walls being supported by stone-buttresses, and also coped with stone, and surmounted by large balls or orbs. The length of this noble room is 93 feet, its breadth 38, and its height 50. The roof, which is of oak, and elaborately carved, is particularly splendid and imposing. The gate-house, which forms the principal entry to the palace, was erected by Cardinal Morton about the year 1490, and is a very beautiful and magnificent structure. On each side are two lofty embattled towers, from the summits of which is one of the finest views in the neighbourhood of the metropolis. In front of this gate the ancient archiepiscopal dole, or alms, is still distributed every Sunday, Tuesday and Thursday, to thirty poor parishioners of Lambeth. Ten are served each day, among whom are divided three stone of beef, ten pitchers of broth thickened with oatmeal, five quatern loaves, and 20d. in copper. One of the most interesting portions of Lambeth palace is the stone-building called the Lollards' Tower. It was erected by Archbishop Chicheley, in the early part of the 15th century, as a place of confinement for the unhappy heretics from whom it derives its name. Under the tower is an apartment of somewhat singular appearance, called the post-room, from a large post in the middle by which its roof is partly supported. The prison in which the poor Lollards were confined is at the top of the tower, and is reached by a very narrow winding staircase. Its single door-way, which is so narrow as to admit only one person at a time, is strongly barricaded by both an outer and an inner door of oak, each $3\frac{1}{2}$ inches thick, and thickly studded with iron. The dimensions of the apartment within are 12 feet in length, by 9 in width, and 8 in height; it is lighted by two windows, which are only 28 inches high, by 14 inches wide on the inside, and about half as high and half as wide on the outside. Both walls and roof of the chamber are lined with oaken planks an inch and a half thick; and 8 large iron rings still remain fastened to the wood, the melancholy memorials of the barbarous tyranny, whose victims formerly pined in this dismal prison. Many names and fragments of sentences are rudely cut out on various parts of the walls. Among the other principal apartments are the library, containing a very extensive collection of books and MSS. (The number of the latter is said to be above 1200,) founded by Archbishop Bancroft in 1610; and the long gallery, generally supposed to have been the work of Cardinal Pole, who held the see from the death of Cranmer, in 1556, till 1558. This noble room contains many portraits, of which several are in the highest degree interesting as works of art, or on account of the individuals they represent. Besides these apartments, the palace contains many which we cannot here describe. We may merely mention the guard-room, an ancient and venerable chamber, 56 feet in height, and adorned by a splendid timber roof. The presence chamber also is of considerable antiquity. The great dining-room, which contains a series of portraits of the archbishops from Laud to Cornwallis inclusive. The old and new drawing-rooms, the latter a fine room measuring 33 feet by 22, built by Archbishop Cornwallis; and the steward's parlour, probably erected by Archbishop Cranmer. The palace is surrounded by a park and gardens, very tastefully laid out, and occupying in all about eighteen acres. Among the ornaments of the grounds are two Marseilles fig-trees of great size, and still bearing an abundance of fruit, which tradition asserts to have been planted by Cardinal Pole."—(Penny Mag., No. 32.) The present archbishop has made extensive additions to the palace, chiefly in the later style of English architecture, and constructed of Portland stone.

Living.—Living, a rectory in the archd. of Surrey and dio. of Winchester, rated at £32 15s. 7½d., and in the patronage of the archbishop of Canterbury. Church ded. to St Mary. It was erected in 1377, and presents a mixture of the early and decorated styles of English architecture. The families of Howard and Leigh have chapels in the interior, and several archbishops of Canterbury, one bishop of Durham, and one of Ely, have been buried here. In the church-yard is the tomb of the Tradescants, who collected the Ashmolean museum, subsequently bequeathed to the university of Oxford by Elias Ashmole, who lies buried in the church. The parliamentary commissioners lately advanced money for the erection of four new district churches; one-half of the sum being a loan payable by the inhabitants. The first is St John's, a handsome Doric structure, with a tower and spire; it stands in the Waterloo road, and was completed in 1834, at an expense of £15,911 16s. 7d. The others are described under the names Britten-causeway, Norwood, and Kennington. In 1828, a new chapel was erected at Lambeth-Batts, at an expense of £7,634 10s. 4d. It is a handsome Gothic building, ded. to St Mary. Private chapels have been erected in various places. The Wesleyan Methodists, Baptists, Swedenborgians and Independents, have places of worship here.

Schools, &c.—Here are many schools. The parochial schools for boys and girls are well endowed; 400 boys and 200 girls are educated, and about 40 of each sex are clothed. Archbishop Tennison's school for girls, has an endowment of £350 per annum. Lawrence's school, founded in 1661, has a revenue of £100. In 1830, Charles Francis, Esq., founded the Eldon school, in commemoration of the chancellor Eldon. The licensed victuallers have a well-supported establishment for the maintenance and endowment of children in distressed circumstances connected with their body. Here is also an asylum for female orphans, in which children of that class receive maintenance, clothing and education, and are, after a certain time, apprenticed, or sent to service. It is incorporated by charter, granted in 1800. St John's school was recently established at an expense of £2,200. Here are also the general lying-in hospital; the royal universal infirmary for children under 14 years; Bethlehem hospital for lunatics; and the Benevolent society of St Patrick for the relief of distressed Irish, and education of their children. There are some almshouses; some of which, for poor widows, were founded in 1626 by Sir Noel Caron, ambassador from Holland to the court of Queen Elizabeth. Distance from St Paul's cathedral, 1½ m. S.W. by S. Pop., in 1801, 27,937; in 1831, 87,856. A. P., £220,618.

LAMBLEY, a parish in the wapentake of Thurgarton, co. of Nottingham. Living, a rectory in the archd. of Nottingham and dio. of York, rated at £10 16s. 3d., and, in 1829, in the patronage of R. D. Flamstead, Esq. Church ded. to the Holy Trinity. Distance from Nottingham, 5 m. N.E. Pop., in 1801, 467; in 1831, 824. A. P., £3,814.

LAMBLEY-UPON-THE-TYNE, a parish in the western division of the ward of Tindale, co. of Northumberland. It includes the townships of Ash-Holm and Lambley Living, a donative or extra-parochial vicarage in the patronage of Robert Lancelot Algood, Esq. Coal is found here in abundance, and of superior quality. Here was formerly a fortress, the site of which, on the Castle-hill, is marked by a deep moat. "An abbey of Benedictine nuns was founded here by King John, or Adam de Tindale. Its tutelary saint was St Patrick. It had six religious women at the time of the dissolution, when its yearly revenues were accounted worth £5 15s. 8d. This house was granted, 7th Edward VI., to John, duke of Northumberland,"—Tanner's Not. Mon. The Scots burned this monastery, and laid waste the country around it, in 1296. The parish is bounded on the east by the South Tyne. Near the river some ancient coffins of oak have been found as black as ebony. Distance from Halkwhistle, 6½ m. S.W. by S. Pop., in 1801, 209; in 1831, 252. A. P., £1,218.

LAMBOURN, a hundred in Berks, situated in the south-western part of the co., bordering on Wilts. Pop., in 1831, 3,065.

LAMBOURN, a parish in the hundred of Lambourn, county of Berks. It comprises the market-town of Chipping-Lambourn and the townships of Upper Lambourn, Blagrave with Hadley, and Eastbury with Bockhampton. The town stands in an agreeable situation near the small river Lambourn, which has the curious property of being dry during the winter. The town is far from being elegant, but contains some good houses, and is well supplied with water. Here is an ancient stone-cross, consisting of a pillar raised on steps, and surmounted by an object now so much defaced, that it is scarcely possible to conjecture what it has been. Friday is market-day. Fairs for cattle, horses, young foals, boots and shoes, are held on May 12th, October 2d, and Dec. 4th. Living, a vicarage in the archd. of Berks and dio. of Salisbury, with the chapelry of Eastbury annexed, rated at £10 11s. 10½d., returned at £112 16s., and in the patronage of the dean of St Paul's. Church ded. to St Michael. This is an ancient cruciform building, in the early style of English architecture, containing two chantry chapels. The Wesleyan Methodists have a place of worship here. "An hospital on the north side of the church was founded by John Isbury, Esq., A.D. 1502, for ten poor men, six nominated by the warden of New college in Oxford, and four by the family of Hillesley in Lambourn. It is yet in being, and the ten poor men therein receive 22s. weekly, three loads of wood, and a certain quantity of wheat and malt yearly, with a share of the fine paid every seventh year for renewing of the lease."—Tanner's Not. Mon. The inmates of this hospital assemble every morning in one of the chantry chapels in the church, and pray, kneeling round the grave of a forefather of Mr Isbury. Here is a Sunday school, to which is annexed a small foundation for teaching eight boys to read and write. Here is also a school for 25 children, endowed with £11 per annum, by John Sergeant, in 1792. Horse-races are held annually on the neighbouring downs. In the vicinity is Ashdon-park, the residence of Earl Craven. Not far from this is the vale of the White Horse, mentioned in our description of the county of Berks. Distance from London, 68 m. W. Pop. of the town, in 1801, 964; in 1831, 1166: of the parish, in 1831, 2386. A. P., £6,806.

LAMBOURN (THE), a small river which rises in the vicinity of the above market-town, and falls into the Kennet near Hatcham.

LAMBOURN, (UPPER), a tything in the parish of Lambourn, co. of Berks. Here was once a chapel. Distance from Lambourn, $1\frac{1}{2}$ m. Pop., in 1801, 346; in 1831, 387.

LAMBOURNE, a parish in the hundred of Ongar, co. of Essex. Living, a rectory in the archd. of Essex and dio. of London, rated at £14, and in the patronage of Corpus Christi college, Cambridge. The church is ded. to St Mary and All Saints, and contains a monument to Winniff, bishop of Lincoln. Here was the residence of Spencer, bishop of Norwich, the site of which is marked by a deep moat. Distance from Epping, 5 m. S. by E. Pop., in 1801, 515; in 1831, 778. A. P., £4,263.

LAMBRIGG, a township in the parish of Kirkby-in-Kendal, ward of Kendal, co. of Westmoreland. Copper was formerly wrought in this vicinity. Here is a long and lofty fell, called Lambrigg Park. Distance from Kendal, 5 m. E.N.E. Pop., in 1801, 124; in 1831, 176. A. P., £1,025.

LAMBROOK (EAST), a parish in the eastern division of the hundred of Kingsbury, co. of Somerset. Living, a discharged rectory in the archd. of Taunton and dio. of Bath and Wells, rated at £6 6s. 8d., returned at from £60 to £70, and in the patronage of the dean and chapter of Wells. Church ded. to St James. The Independents have a chapel here. The landholders have an unlimited right of common in West Moor. Distance from Langport, 5 m. S. by E. Pop. returned with Kingsbury-Episcopi.

LAMBROOK (WEST), a tything in the parish of Kingsbury-Episcopi, eastern division of the hundred of Kingsbury, co. of Somerset. Distance from Langport, 4 m. S. by E.

LAMBSTON, or LAMBERTON, a parish in the hundred of Rhôs, co. of Pembroke, S. W. It is situated on the high road from Haverford to St David's, and near the shore of St Bride's bay. Living, a perpetual curacy in the archd. and dio. of St David's, not in charge, rated at £5, returned at £108 9s., and in the patronage of Pembroke college, Oxford. The area of this parish is 1480 acres. Distance from Haverford-West, 3 m. W. by N. Pop., in 1831, 286. A. P., £734.

LAMBTON, a township in the parish of Chester-le-Street, northern division of the ward of Easington, co.-palatine of Durham. Salt is made here from brine springs, which issue from the bottom of coal pits. Here is Lambton castle, situated in a beautiful and extensive park, well-wooded, watered by the river Wear and commanding extensive and varied prospects. Here were anciently Harraton hall, the seat of the D'Arcy family, and an ancient chapel, the site of which is yet visible within the entrance of the modern park. Here is Worm-hill, which tradition relates to have been infested by a formidable snake, which a member of the Lambton family killed. Distance from Durham, 8 m. N.N.E. Pop., in 1801, 266; in 1831, 256.

LAMER, a hamlet in the parish of Wheat-hampstead, hundred of Dacorum, co. of Hertford, $3\frac{1}{2}$ m. W. from Welwyn.

LAMERTON, or LAMBERTON, a parish which, though inclosed by the hundred of Tavistock, forms, with Sydenham-Damerel, a division of the hundred of Lifton, co. of Devon. Living, a vicarage in the archd. of Totness and dio. of Exeter, rated at £13 2s. 1d., and, in 1829, in the patronage of the Rev. H. H. Tremayne. Church ded. to St Peter. It contains the effigies of Andrew and Nicholas Tremayne, twin-children of Thomas Tremayne, who resembled each other so closely that their parents could scarcely distinguish them, and were killed together at Newhaven in 1564. Near this is the Brent-Tor, a lofty mountain, which serves as a sea-mark to mariners in the English channel, from the top of which the ships in Plymouth harbour can be distinctly seen. Here is a charity school. The church formerly belonged to the abbey of Tavistock. Distance from Tavistock, 2 m. N.W. by N. Pop., in 1801, 722; in 1831, 1209. A. P., £7,698.

LAMESLEY, a chapelry and township in the parish of Chester-le-Street, middle division of the ward of Chester, co.-palatine of Durham. Living, a perpetual curacy in the archd. and dio. of Durham, not in charge, returned at £90, and, in 1829, in the patronage of Lord Ravensworth. Here is a free school, supported by Lord Ravensworth. Iron-stone is found here, but is not wrought. Here are several extensive coal-mines and quarries of grindstone. Distance from Gateshead, $3\frac{1}{2}$ m. S. Pop., in 1801, 1705; in 1831, 1910. A. P., £12,212.

LAMMANA, a place in Cornwall, where was a cell to the abbey of Glastonbury.

LAMMAS, or LAMEUS, a parish in the southern division of the hundred of Erpingham, co. of Norfolk. Living, a discharged rectory, not in charge, in the archd. and dio. of Norwich, endowed with £200 royal bounty and £200 private benefaction, and annexed to the rectory of Little Hautbois. The church is ded. to St Andrew, and contains some curious specimens of stained glass. Distance from Coltishall, 3 m. N.W. by N. Pop., with Little Hautbois, in 1801, 251; in 1831, 303. A. P., £1,334.

LAMONDBY, a township in the parish of Skelton, ward of Leath, co. of Cumberland. Free-stone is quarried here. Distance from Penrith, $8\frac{1}{2}$ m. N.W. by W. Pop., in 1801, 244; in 1831, 544.

LAMORRAN, or LANMORRAN, a parish in the western division of the hundred of Powder, co. of Cornwall. Living, a rectory in the archd. of Cornwall and dio. of Exeter, rated at £6, returned at £145, and, in 1829, in the patronage of the earl of Falmouth. Church ded. to St Moren. The southern side of the parish is bounded by the Fal. Distance from Tregoney, 4 m. S.W. by W. Pop., in 1801, 78; in 1831, 96. A. P., £895.

LAMPETER. See LLAN-BEDEA.

LAMPLUGH, a parish in the ward of Allerdale, above Derwent, co. of Cumberland. It includes the townships of Ketton, Murton, and Winder. Living, a rectory in the archd. of Richmond and dio. of Chester, rated at £10 4s. 7d., and, in 1829, in the patronage of the trustees of E. Copley, Esq. Church ded. to St Michael. Here is a school endowed with part of a rent-charge, left for charitable purposes in 1747, by Richard Briscoe, Esq. Limestone is quarried here. On the eastern side of the parish are Lowes-water and Crummock-water. Here is also a mineral well. Distance from Whitehaven, 7 m. E.N.E. Pop., in 1801, 117; in 1831, 624. A. P., £5,706.

LAMPFORT, a parish in the hundred of Orlingbury, co. of Northampton. It includes the hamlets of Lampfort and Hanging-Houghton. Living, a rectory in the archd. of Northampton and dio. of Peterborough, rated at £48 2s. 6d., and, in 1829, in the patronage of Sir Just. Isham, Bart. To this is annexed the curacy of Faxton. Church ded. to All Saints. In 1762, Sir Edmund Isham, Bart., gave £1,500 for the endowment of a school and other charitable purposes. Distance from Northampton, 9 m. N. Pop., in 1801, 148; in 1831, 250. A. P., £3,305.

LAMPTON, a hamlet in the parish of Long-Aston, hundred of Hartcliffe with Bedminster, co. of Somerset.

LAMYATT, a parish in the hundred of Whitestone, co. of Somerset. Living, a rectory in the archd. of Wells and dio. of Bath and Wells, rated at £12 4s. 2d., and, in 1829, in the patronage of Sir George Ridout. Church ded. to St Mary and St John. Distance from Bruton, 2½ m. W. by N. Pop., in 1801, 206; in 1831, 204. A. P., £1,394.

LANCASTER,

A county-palatine of England, extending along the coast of the Irish sea, which bounds it on the west, from 53° 23' to 54° 24' N. lat., and from 2° 18' to 3° 7' W. long. It is bounded on the north by the counties of Cumberland and Westmoreland; on the south by the county-palatine of Chester; and on the east by the county of York. It may be regarded as comprising three great natural divisions, the first of which, on the north, is entirely detached from the rest, across the bay of Morecambe, and is comprehended between the river Duddon, which separates it from Cumberland, and the Ken, which separates it from Westmoreland; the second lies between the Ken and the Ribble; and the third between the Ribble and the Mersey, which last separates the county from that of Cheshire. The first is called Furness, and contains the division of the hundred of Lonsdale, north of the Sands; the second comprises the hundreds of Lonsdale, south of the Sands, and Amounderness; and the third comprises the hundreds of Blackburn, Leyland, Salford, and West Derby. The extreme length of the county, including the district of Furness, is about 74 miles, the extreme breadth about 45 miles. Its superficial extent is 1831 square miles, or 1,171,840 statute acres.

Civil Divisions, Population, &c.—The county is divided into the six hundreds of Amounderness, Blackburn, Leyland, Lonsdale, Salford, and West Derby. It contains the boroughs of Lancaster, Liverpool, Preston, Wigan, Clitheroe, and Newton, for each of which two members are returned to parliament; and the market-towns of Ashton-under-Lyne, Blackburn, Bolton, Burnley, Bury, Cartmel, Chorley, Colne, Dalton, Garstang, Haslingden, Hawkshead, Kirkham, Leigh, Manchester, Middleton, Oldham, Ormskirk, Poulton, Preatcot, Rochdale, Saddleworth, Salford, Tormonden, Ulverstone, and Warrington. Of these, Lancaster, Liverpool, Poulton, and Ulverstone, are sea-ports.—Four members of parliament are now returned for this county: viz. two for the northern division, including the whole of the several hundreds of Lonsdale, Amounderness, Leyland, and Blackburn, who are polled at Lancaster; and two for the southern division, including the whole of the respective hundreds of Salford and West Derby, who are polled at Newton.—The county is included in the northern circuit, and the assizes are held at Lancaster, where the county-gaol stands. There are 100 acting magistrates, who hold the annual court of general session at Preston, on the first Thursday after the feast of St John the Baptist, and following days. Courts of quarter-session are held at Lancaster, Preston, Salford, and Kirkdale, beginning after Epiphany, Easter-Sunday, the festival of St Thomas a Becket, and Oct. 11th. At Manchester, Kirkdale, and Preston, are houses of correction. The duchy of Lancaster is described in a separate article.—The population of Lancaster has increased in a remarkable manner since the introduction of manufactures. The population in 1700, was 166,200; in 1750, 297,400; in 1801, 695,100; in 1811, 828,309; and in 1831, 1,336,854. The number of families engaged in agriculture in 1821, was 22,743; those engaged in manufactures amounted to 152,271. The proportion of females exceeds that of males; thus, in 1811, there were 334,004 males, and 434,205 females; in 1821, the males were 512,746, and the females 640,383; and in 1831, there were 686,465 females, and 650,389 males. The scale of mortality, on an average of ten years, has been as 1 to 55 of the population. The rates raised in this county in 1803, amounted to £230,763; in 1815, to £433,409; and in 1827, to £545,737 3s. The total amount of assessed property in 1815, was £3,187,774.

Ecclesiastical Affairs.—This county lies in the province of York, and contains part of the archdeaconries of Chester and Richmond, in the diocese of Chester. That part which is in the archdeaconry of Chester is subdivided into the deaneries of Blackburn, Leyland, Manchester, and Warrington; that which belongs to the archdeaconry of Richmond, into those of Amounderness, Furness, Kendal, and Lonsdale. The number of parishes and parochial chapels is 66; but chapels-of-ease are very numerous; the rectories are 26, the vicarages 27, and the remainder are curacies. There are some ancient churches, the most remarkable of which are that of Cartmel and the collegiate church of Manchester. Of ancient ecclesiastical edifices, the most important remains are those of the abbeys of Furness, Cockerand, and Whalley.

Face of the County.—The surface of this county presents great varieties of aspect. A ridge of lofty hills separates it from Yorkshire, connected with a great ridge to which has been given the name of the backbone of England. This part of the county, though occasionally intersected by fertile valleys, is generally barren and heathy, the rocks being chiefly free-stone. Furness is also mountainous, partly moory, containing whin-stone rocks, often very lofty and precipitous. Conistone-Fell, in this part of the hundred of Lonsdale, is the most lofty mountain in the county, rising to the elevation of 2577 feet above the level of the sea. Here is also the lake of Conistone, called Conistomere. A part of Winandermere also extends into this division, and bounds the county for a considerable distance. Along the rivers Mersey, Ribble, Fylde, and Lune, there are more or less extensive and fertile valleys. Extensive bogs and mosses occur in various parts of the county, the principal of which are the Chatmoss, near Worley, and Pilling-moss. In describing the sea-coast, we shall commence at the southern extremity. The Mersey here empties itself into an estuary, contracted at the mouth, and crossed by a sand-bank, or bar, which greatly impedes the navigation, on which, at low water, there is not more than one or two feet of water, but the high tide rises from 21 to 28 feet. The coast is very flat, and has suffered much from the encroachments of the sea. The coast sweeps in the form of a segment of a circle from the mouth of the Mersey to that of the Ribble, in the estuary of which are many sand-banks, dry at low water, but covered by the tide to a depth of six fathoms. Farther north, the great bay of Morecambe divides the upper part of the hundred of Lonsdale from the main body of the county. This bay is in a great measure dry at low water, and though a dangerous rout, the sands are often crossed by travellers to and from Furness. The coast of the promontory of Furness is very irregular, and terminates in the estuary of the Duddon. Off the extremity of this peninsula are several islands, the principal of which is Walney; it is so low that it is frequently inundated. It would appear that these islands were formerly in one, and probably connected with the mainland. The waste lands of the county have been computed to amount to 36,000 acres, of which 20,000 are moss-land, and 16,000 marsh-land; but it is impossible to estimate their extent with perfect accuracy, as many portions have been drained or otherwise improved, and are in process of being brought under cultivation. There are several districts called forests, but they contain little wood; and, indeed, the face of the country in general is bare of trees. In the hundreds of Amounderness and Lonsdale are the forests of Myerscough, Fulwood, Bleasdale, Wyersdale, and Quernmoor, which are the property of the king as duke of Lancaster. They have been in a great measure inclosed and partly brought under cultivation. In the central parts of the county are some woods, but of no great extent; artificial planting has been attempted, but not carried to a great extent.

Lakes and Rivers.—The lakes of this county are situated in the northern part of it. Conistone lake, or Thurston water, extends from north to south through the district of Furness; its length is about 7 m., and its breadth varies from $\frac{1}{2}$ m. to $\frac{3}{4}$ m. Its depth does not in any place exceed 40 fathoms. It contains abundance of perch, trout, and char. Its banks are sinuous and well-wooded, and the scenery in its immediate vicinity is very picturesque.—Winandermere belongs partly to Lancaster and partly to Westmoreland. It is 15 miles in length, and forms part of the line of boundaries of this county. The average breadth is about a mile, and the greatest depth is 201 feet. It is famous for char.—The lake of Esthwaite is about two miles in length by half a mile in breadth. Its banks are picturesque, but not bold and rugged, and it contains an island, which tradition relates to have once been floating. It contains pike, trout, eels, and perch, but though it communicates with Winandermere, no char are found in it. It lies to the east of Hawkshead. Among the mountains are numerous small lakes called tarns, which do not deserve particular notice. Near Ormskirk is a sheet of water called Martenmere, which in summer becomes nearly dry.—The principal rivers in Lancashire are the Mersey, Ribble, and Lune; but the Irwell, Douglas, Wyre, Leven, Crake, and Duddon, are considerable streams, and partly navigable.—The Mersey rises in the counties of Chester and Derby, and flows for nearly 60 miles between the counties of Lancaster and Chester. Its course along this boundary is exceedingly tortuous, but tends from east to west. It becomes navigable at the mouth of the river Irwell, which has also been deepened, so that small vessels can pass up to Manchester. At Warrington the rise of the tide is obstructed by a wear, and vessels are obliged to pass by an artificial cut. At Runcorn the river opens into a wide estuary, the mouth of which contracts very much in diameter, and is crossed by a dangerous sand-bank. The navigable portion of the river, from Liverpool upwards, is 35 miles long. Salmon, smelts, and other fish, are found in the Mersey.—The river Ribble, which rises in the county of York, comes in contact with this county near Downham, passes Clitheroe, forming a boundary between Yorkshire and Lancashire for a few miles, till it is joined by the Hodder. It now runs in a south-westerly direction across the county, passing Ribchester, Walton, and Preston, and falling into an estuary which gradually expands into the Irish sea. This estuary contains many sand-banks, which are covered to a considerable depth by the tide. It is navigable but for a very short distance, and the tide rises only to Preston. Salmon are remarkably abundant in this river, and the legal duration of the fisheries is greater here than in other rivers.—The Lune rises in the fells, or mountainous parts of Westmoreland; it enters this county near Kirkby-Lonsdale, and being joined by several smaller streams, runs along the vale of Lonsdale in a south-westerly direction. At Lancaster it becomes navigable, though not for ships of large burden; and lower down it expands into an estuary of very irregular form, which opens by a narrow mouth into the Irish sea at Sunderland point. Salmon are caught in abundance in this river.—The Irwell rises in the mountainous ridge which separates this county from Yorkshire, not far from Todmorden, and after running for a short distance westward, passing Bury and Manchester, from which it turns to the south-west, falling into the Mersey below Flixton. It was made navigable as far as Manchester, pursuant to an act of parliament of the year 1720; vessels of from 60 to 70 tons burden can sail on it. On its course it receives the waters of the Roch, the Irk, and the Medlock.—The river Douglas rises near Billinge, in the moors of Anglezarke, from which it runs nearly S.S. West, passing Wigan, receiving the waters of several smaller streams, and falling into the estuary of the Ribble. This river was made navigable to Wigan in 1727, and has facilitated greatly the exportation of coal from the central districts. Near Latham, the Leeds and Liverpool canal crosses it, and passing to Wigan, has superseded in a great measure the navigation of the intermediate portion of the river.—The river Wyre is formed by the junction of a number of small streams, rising in the mountainous district of the hundred of Amounderness, running W. from Wyresdale to Poulton, from which it turns to the north, opens into a navigable estuary, and falls into the Irish sea.—The Leven is the channel through which the lake of Winandermere discharges itself, opening into the bay of Morecambe.—The Duddon rises not far from Ambleside in Westmoreland, and runs in a south-westerly direction, forming the boundary of this county and Cumberland, forming at length a large estuary on the Irish sea.

Climate.—The county of Lancaster is remarkable for its humidity. Perhaps a greater quantity of rain falls here than in any other county in the kingdom, and the atmosphere, even when no rain falls, is often cold and damp. A register kept at Liverpool, between the years 1784 and 1792, indicated the smallest quantity of rain at $24\frac{1}{2}$ inches, and the greatest at $54\frac{1}{2}$. During the same period, the mean temperature at Lancaster was $51\frac{1}{2}^{\circ}$.

The humidity of the atmosphere is partly owing to the vicinity of the sea, and the lofty range of hills in the eastern part of the county. The winds which prevail most are the south, south-west, and north-east. The west and north-east winds are often very cold, but there are seldom thick fogs. The temperature of the summer is generally low, and in many places the spring is very backward, especially in the northern and eastern parts.

Soil.—The county may be divided into three portions, each differing in respect of the nature of the soil. The district of Furness, and the mountainous district bordering on Yorkshire, consist chiefly of peaty land, unfit for cultivation, except in the valleys, which present alluvial deposits of various depths, and more or less fertile. Blue clay and marl occasionally occur among the peat-earth. The valley land is known by the provincial name of holme. The next division is that which extends southwards from the Lune to the Ribble, where the prevailing soil is clayey loam; the lower part of which is the richest corn land in the county. About two-thirds of this is dairy land, the rest arable. From the Ribble to the Mersey a sandy loam of considerable fertility prevails. A very small part of this is under cultivation; the greater part is laid out in grass. Small portions of limestone land are scattered over the county, especially the northern parts of it.

Agricultural Produce.—About one-fourth part of the county has been brought into cultivation. The immense demand for grass and hay for the support of horses, cows, and sheep, has prevented the extension of tillage. Wheat, oats, barley, beans, and potatoes, are cultivated. Less extensive crops are raised of rye, peas, taro, turnips, carrots, lucerne, and cabbages. The average produce of oats per acre is 45 bushels, of wheat 25, and of barley 35. "The rotation of crops followed, is by no means judicious or profitable. In many parts, oats are sown for years together; and even in the Fylde district, where agriculture is more extensively the object of attention, the land is cropped in a very severe and unhusbandlike manner. The points of agriculture for which Lancashire is most noted, are the application of marl, the cultivation of oats and potatoes, and cattle. The climate, and, in general, the soil of the county are favourable to the growth of oats; and this grain constitutes the principal food of the labouring classes even in the manufacturing districts; hence oats are cultivated to a great extent, and in general with considerable attention and skill. Various kinds are grown, especially the tartarian and potatoe oats. Wheat does not succeed well in this county, more from the coldness and moistness of the climate, than from the nature of the soil; for in part of Furness, the low lands near the shore beyond Lancaster, the Fylde, and the south-west part of the county, there are excellent wheat lands. There is still less barley grown, and scarcely any pease or beans. For potatoes, Lancashire has long been famous; and indeed the cultivation of this root is here extremely well understood, and their cookery not less so. Lancashire is said to have been the first county in which they were grown. The best mode of cultivating them is on the sward; they are always drilled, and well hoed while growing. Great attention is paid to changing the seed, in order to prevent the curl. The produce, on a medium, is from 200 to 350 bushels per acre. Early potatoes are much cultivated, and with very great care and skill, near the large towns. The general size of farms is about 50 acres; very few exceed 200. Although agriculture has not advanced very rapidly in Lancashire, yet in respect to agricultural implements, this county is not so far behind as many other districts, the agriculture of which is more celebrated. The ploughs in every part of the county are light and well constructed. There are no waggons, and single horse carts are by no means uncommon."—(Brewster's Encyclopædia.) Agriculture has been much encouraged by several societies. The earliest of these arose in Manchester in 1767, and extends its influence to a great distance around that town. There is a similar society in the hundred of West Derby, one at Whalley for the eastern part of the county, one at Lancaster, and a fifth at Ulverstone for North Lonsdale. Lancashire is also celebrated for horticulture, and meetings are frequently held, at which specimens of the finest fruits and flowers are exhibited. The county is particularly famous for gooseberries. Vegetables are cultivated to a great extent in the vicinity of the large towns; and fruit-trees are numerous in similar situations. Near Manchester there are upwards of 60 acres planted with apple-trees. In the neighbourhood of Liverpool the market gardens are particularly extensive, from the great demand for the supply of the shipping. A large portion of the county is under grass, and there are many dairy farms, especially in the vicinity of the towns. Cheese and butter are also produced, and exported to a considerable extent. The dairy farms are most numerous on the north of the Ribble, in the Fylde, north of the Lune, and of Lancaster sands, and in the lower lands of Furness. "The Fylde is the principal district of this county, which keeps a surplus stock of poultry. Poulterers also collect the chief part of what is brought to the Ormeau market, from the cottagers and farmers, and retail them out again at the Liverpool market. On Martin mere, are turned a number of flocks of geese, on a certain day, brought from various parts of the county. These flocks are so marked as again to be known. Upon this mere they continue till about Michaelmas, where they find sufficient food from the grass, insects, &c. The proprietor of the water claims half the stock that remains alive for their summer's keep."

Cattle.—The horses of Lancashire are generally good, both for the team and the saddle. The Lancashire breed of horses were used by Mr Bakewell, as the basis of his improvements; but in the county itself, little attention is paid to improving or keeping up this breed; they are universally preferred to oxen for the purposes of husbandry. The horses most in request are strong trace horses; stout, compact saddle horses; and a light middle-sized breed for mail-coach and post-horses. There is a breed of cattle peculiar to Lancashire, known by the name of the 'Lancashire long horses.' These are much more in demand in the midland counties than in Lancashire itself; they are bred, however, in almost all parts of the county, but the prime stock is kept in the Fylde. For feeding, this breed and the small Scotch are preferred. For the dairy, the Holderness, Derbyshire improved, Yorkshire red, and Suffolk poll cows, are preferred. A considerable quantity of cheese is made in this county, chiefly, however, of inferior quality, except that of Leigh, which, though the land is barren, is little inferior in mildness and richness to that of Dunlop in Ayrshire. The quantity yielded by a cow is about 300 lbs fit for the market. A fine breed of sheep is peculiar to the mountainous districts about Warton and Silverdale; but the new Leicester and South Down breeds, as well as the black-faced Scotch and Welsh, are numerous. They are kept chiefly in the northern parts of the county, being turned out to the hills in summer, and brought into enclosed pastures during the winter. Furness fells afford food for upwards of 50,000 sheep during the summer. Hogs are fed to a considerable extent.

Mineral Productions.—The most common substratum in the county is free-stone: of this there are three varieties,—the yellow, white, and red. Limestone occurs in many places, and is wrought both for the purposes of building and of agriculture. It abounds in the north and north-east parts of the county, but none is found in the south or western parts, except near Liverpool, where it is only found in small quantity, and at great depth; and near Leigh and Manchester, where lime, peculiarly adapted for tarras, occurs. Marl is abundant in the south and western parts of the county, and is much in demand for the purposes of agriculture. Chalk occurs nowhere. Coal is very abundant, especially in the hundreds of West Derby, Salford and Blackburn. A species which is found here in greater abundance than any where else, is the cannel coal of Haigh, near Wigan. It is peculiarly adapted for the gas-maker. Lead is found at Anglezark, near Chorley, but is not very abundant. Copper is wrought in High Furness, in the mines of Conistone and Muckle-Gill. Iron is also wrought in the mines of Lindal-moor and Cross-gates, in the liberty of Furness. At Holland, near Wigan, there are quarries of flap and grey slates, and large quantities of blue slate are procured from the hills near Hawkshead; they form a lucrative branch of the export trade of the county. Scythe stones are obtained near Rainford.

Manufactures.—The principal manufacture of Lancashire is that of cotton goods in all its branches. In this branch it stands before all other counties of England, and it can claim the honour of having been the first in which it was settled, and the nursery of the greater number of important improvements on it.

These are noticed in the articles Manchester, Blackburn, Bolton, &c. The manufacture of cloth in steam-looms was first established at Manchester in 1806, and has extended since that period in a great degree. Calico printing and bleaching establishments of great extent have been opened at Manchester, Blackburn, Bolton, Bury, Ayrington, &c. There are also considerable manufactories of fustians, woollen goods, and hats, in these and other towns. Self-cloth is made at Warrington, mahogany furniture and upholstery at Lancaster. There are numerous manufactories of pins, glass, earthenware, paper, chemical substances, &c. Liverpool is celebrated for watches and watch-ticks. Iron-works are numerous in the northern part of the county.

Commerce.—Of the foreign commerce of Lancashire, Liverpool is the grand medium, and a more particular account will be found in our description of that town. The exports are chiefly the manufactures of the counties of Lancaster, York, Warwick, and Stafford. The imports are chiefly colonial produce. The trade of the smaller ports of Lancaster, Ulverston, and Preston, is chiefly coasting.

Island Navigation.—Lancashire was the first county in modern times in which canals were formed. It is at present the richest in artificial navigation. Taking Wigan as the centre of the southern district, we may describe three great branches:—the one passing northwards by Preston and Lancaster, and entering Westmoreland near Burton;—the second sweeping in a north-westerly, and then in a southerly direction, joining the Mersey at Liverpool;—and the third running for a considerable distance parallel to the first, turning to the north-east, and passing near Oswaldtwistle, runs in a north-easterly direction; and entering Yorkshire near Foulridge, passes Manchester, crosses the Mersey, and enters Cheshire near Stratford. Connected with this great line are numerous side-cuts. A separate line of upwards of 30 miles in length enters from Cheshire near Eccles, passes to Manchester, and from thence runs in a northerly direction, entering Yorkshire near Todmorden. Another of considerable length joins the Mersey, and runs by a semi-circular sweep to the north-east, terminating near Prescott. The earliest attempt at the formation of a canal was the proposed deepening of the Sankey brook, which was begun in the middle of last century, but was soon changed into a proper canal, joining the Mersey, and extending about 11½ miles into the county. On this there are several locks, and the highest portion rises to the height of 60 feet above the Mersey. The duke of Bridgewater's canal was begun in 1758 at Worsley. Under various acts of parliament it has been extended in both directions. It may be described as commencing at Leigh, from which it runs east to Worsley, turning to the south-west, passes the Irwell by a lofty aqueduct of three arches, turns due south, crosses the Mersey by an aqueduct near Stratford, makes a semicircular sweep through part of Cheshire, and joins the Mersey at Runcorn gap. Before crossing the Mersey, this canal gives off a branch, which passes to Manchester, and joins the great line which runs northward to join the Leeds and Liverpool canal. From Leigh, a navigable cut has lately been made, running in a north-west direction, and joining the Leeds and Liverpool canal at Wigan. The Leeds and Liverpool canal was begun in 1770. It commences at Liverpool, and leaves the county near Foulridge, the altitude of which, above the basin at Liverpool, is about 433 feet. It gives off a branch 7½ m. in length to Wigan, thus communicating with the duke of Bridgewater's canal; it gives off a small branch to Rufford, and communicates with the Lancaster extensive canals. The line which extends from Manchester to this canal has been formed at different periods, and consists of the Manchester and Bury, and the Haslingden extensive cuts. Its length is 28 m. 1 furlong, and it gives off short cuts to Bolton and Bury. Another line of canal runs northward from Manchester. This is called the Rochdale canal. At Manchester it communicates with that of the duke of Bridgewater, and runs northward, leaving the county near Todmorden, joining the Calder navigation at Sowerby bridge, near Halifax. From Manchester, a canal runs eastward, to Ashton-under-Lyne, where it joins the Huddersfield, which running north-east, skirts the county for 6 m. The great northern line of navigation, which runs in a northerly direction through two-thirds of the county, is the Kendal and Lancaster canals. It was begun subsequent to 1792, and extends from Kendal to West Houghton, a distance of 75½ m. It enters the county near Burton, crosses the Lune by an aqueduct, passes Lancaster, crosses the Wyre at Garstang, passes Preston, crosses the Ribble, joins the Leeds and Liverpool canal, crosses the Douglas, and terminates at West Houghton. Its mid-level is at Berwick, and extends for 42 m., from which it rises to Kendal 65 ft., and to West Houghton, 222 ft. It sends off short collateral cuts at Chorley, Berwick, and Glasston. At Ulverston is a short cut, communicating with the Leven.

Roads.—The county is crossed by the road from London to Carlisle; from London to Manchester and Preston; and from London to Manchester and Clithero. The provincial roads are numerous and well kept. It has been said that there is a greater length of roads in this county in proportion to its extent, than in any other in the kingdom. In the north and north-eastern parts they are made of limestone; in the middle and southern parts they are chiefly paved with stones, principally brought from the Welsh and Scotch coasts. On the road between Manchester and Liverpool, slag or copper scoria has been used with advantage.

Railways.—In this point of view also; Lancashire is superior to any other county in England. From Bolton to Leigh, from Wigan to Newton and Warrington, and from St Helens to Runcorn gap, are railways, which require, however, in this place, no particular description. They increase, in a great degree, the facility of inland communication, and the exchange of the produce of different districts. Attached to many of the coal-works are more or less extended railways communicating with the canals, or with the greater lines of railway. The grandest work of the kind is the Liverpool and Manchester railway, which was opened on the 15th September, 1830. It extends from Wapping in Liverpool, to Water-street in Manchester, a distance of upwards of 31 miles; in the course of which it passes 63 bridges, through two tunnels, the one 1980 yards in length, the other 290; and along several miles of artificial embankment. The expense of the whole exceeded £800,000; the bridge over the valley of the Sankey cost £45,000, and the embankment crossing the Chat moss £27,719 11s. 10d. The opening of this railway will be memorable, from an accident, by which the late Mr Huskisson lost his life.

Antiquities.—There are numerous relics of the Romans in this county; these will be found noticed in the articles Colm, Lancaster, Manchester, Overborough, Ribchester and Warrington. Roman stations are believed to have existed at Lancaster, Overborough, Blackrod or Ribchester, Colm, and Manchester. From the Manchester station, many roads are diverged over the county. Modern castles are those of Clitheroe, Dalton, Gleaston, Greenhalgh, Hornby, and Lancaster. The religious houses will be noticed in our accounts of the separate parishes.

History.—This county was inhabited under the Romans by the Setantii, a tribe of the Brigantes, and was included in the province of Maxima Cæsariensis. This was the scene of various conflicts between the Britons and Saxons in the 6th century, and finally was conquered by Ella, who incorporated it with his kingdom of Deira. In 1363, it was raised by Edward III. to the dignity of a co-palatine. It was the scene of many of the operations during the civil wars in the reign of Charles I., and a large party of the inhabitants took part with the king. Manchester became, in 1643, the head quarters of Sir Thomas Fairfax, having previously repelled several attempts which the royalists had made to get possession of it. Lancaster was alternately in the hands of both parties. A sanguinary battle was fought at Preston on the 17th of July, 1648, between the Scots, under the duke of Hamilton, and the parliamentary army under Cromwell, when the former were routed with great slaughter. On the 20th the armies again met at Wenwick with the same result. At Wigan, in 1651, the forces of the earl of Derby were routed by Colonel Lilburne, and the earl himself soon after was taken prisoner, and beheaded at Bolton. The troops of the pretender, in 1715, took up their quarters at Preston; but being too few to make any resistance, they soon laid down their arms. The army of the young pretender, in 1745, traversed the county both on their advance and on their retreat.

Duchy and Palatinate.—Lancashire was originally designated an honour, and as such was bestowed at the Conquest on Roger de Poitou. This nobleman having forfeited it by rebellion, it came into the hands of Stephen, afterwards king of England. Henry III. made his youngest son earl of Lancaster, and conferred on him the honour and estates which had previously been for some time in the possession of the earl of Chester. By Edward III. the title of duke was conferred on a descendant of the earl, and raised the county to a palatinate, in favour of his son, John of Gaunt, to whom the dukedom had been transferred on his marriage with the heiress of the first duke. Through Henry of Bolingbroke, this duchy and the estates passed to the crown, and were held successively by him as Henry IV., by Henry V. and by Henry VI. By the latter they were lost, and by act of parliament were annexed to the crown, in the persons of Edward IV. and his heirs for ever. Henry VIII. added many estates of dissolved monasteries to the duchy, the revenue of which, however, is curtailed by leases granted by succeeding monarchs. The duchy of Lancaster includes both the county-palatine and many estates in other counties of England. The duchy has a court of chancery, held at Westminster, in which appeals may be heard from the chancery-court of the county-palatine, with a further right of appeal to the king in parliament. The judges in the county-palatine hold their commissions from the duchy; the sheriffs are appointed under the same authority. The duchy had a star-chamber till the dissolution of that court in the reign of Charles I. The officers of the duchy-court are the chancellor, attorney-general, king's sergeant, king's council, receiver-general, two auditors, clerk of the council and registrar, deputy-registrar and secretary, and two clerks in court. It has cognizance of all questions of equity, affecting the duchy and county-palatine, and its proceedings are dated before his majesty at his palace at Westminster. The court of chancery for the county-palatine was founded by Edward III., and is thus mentioned in the letters patent: "We have granted for ourselves and our heirs to our son (John), that he shall have, during life, within the county of Lancaster, his courts of chancery, and writs to be issued under his seal belonging to the office of chancellor; his justices both for holding pleas of the crown and for all other pleas relating to common law, and the cognizance thereof, and all executions by his writs and officers within the same." All writs from the courts of Westminster must be addressed to the chancellor of the county-palatine, who issues the necessary mandate to the sheriff, and receives the answer. The officers of this court are the chancellor of the duchy, vice-chancellor, registrar, examiner, and chief clerk; with seal-keeper, clerks in court, messenger, attorney-general, and two king's council. It sits twice a-year at Lancaster, and twice at Preston, and has concurrent jurisdiction in matters of equity with the high court of chancery and the court of exchequer, except when the subject of the suits and the residences of the litigants are both within the county, when it has exclusive jurisdiction. The chief judge in the county is the vice-chancellor; the chancellor sits at Westminster. The county has a court of common pleas, with which, in most cases, the courts of king's bench and of common pleas at Westminster have concurrent jurisdiction. This court saves the time and expense of sending to London for writs in cases of arrests. It is held at Lancaster every assize, and has jurisdiction over all real actions for lands, in all actions against corporations within the county, and over all personal actions when the defendant resides in Lancashire.

LANCASTER,

A parish, partly in the hundred of Lonsdale, south of the Sands, and partly in that of Amounderness, county-palatine of Lancaster. It contains the borough, port, county and market-town of Lancaster, which has separate jurisdiction; in the hundred of Lonsdale, the chapelrys of Caton, Grassingham, Overton, Peshon, and Over Wyerdsdale, and the townships of Aldcliffe, Ashton with Stodday, Bare, Balk, Henton with Oxcliffe, Middleton, Quernmeer, Scotforth, Skerton, Thurnham and Terrieholme; and, in the hundred of Amounderness, the townships of Falwood, Myerscough, and Prossall with Hackinsall, and the chapelrys of Bleasdale, and Stalmin with Strinall. Pop. of the parish, in 1831, 22,294.

History.—The town of Lancaster has been supposed by some to have been anciently called Langovicium, a station mentioned by Antoninus in his itinerary. But there is greater probability in the idea of Whitaker that it was the station which Richard of Cirencester denominates Ad Alannum. This indicates its situation by the river Lune, which was probably called Alannus by the Romans, and there is distinct evidence of its having been occupied by that people, in the multitude of utensils, sepulchral apparatus, akara, coins, and the like, which have from time to time been discovered here. The name is evidently a corruption of the Latin words castrum, a camp or station, and Alannum, the name of the river; passing probably from Castrum Alannum to Alann-caster, Lann-caster, and Lancaster. It has been derived in a similar manner from the Saxon words Lene, the name of the river, and Coastre, a word evidently derived from the Roman Castrum. The Saxons gave it the name of Lone-caster, or 'the castle on the Lone.' It became very early a place of importance, and the capital of the county, and a fortress was built here by the Anglo-Saxons, which the Picts and Scots are said to have destroyed. At the conquest, in consequence of various invasions, it had declined very much, and is not mentioned as a town in the Norman survey; but being granted to Roger de Poitou, and chosen by him for his residence, it began to revive. It is very doubtful whether at that time any part of the ancient castle was in a habitable state; many are of opinion that it was not, and that no part of the present structure is older than the conquest; it is proper, however, to mention that tradition refers one portion of it to Adrian, in 124, and another to the father of Constantine, in 305. However, Roger erected a castle, or part of a castle here, to which John, earl of Lancaster and Morton added a beautiful gateway, and John of Gaunt a tower, which still goes by the name of his seat. The remains of this structure, with some recent additions, are now used as the county-gaol. The town was burnt by the Scots in 1323 and 1369; it suffered also during the struggles of the houses of York and Lancaster, in the parliamentary war, and in the rebellion of 1745.

General Description.—The town stands on the southern bank of the Lune, partly situated on a rising ground, on the summit of which stands the castle. The streets, which are generally narrow, are paved, watched, and lighted, and contain many handsome houses. These are chiefly constructed of free-stone, which abounds in the vicinity, and roofed with slate. Some of the more modern streets are spacious and handsome, and in the outskirts of the town elegant villas are scattered in great profusion. Over the river is a handsome stone-bridge of five arches, which was erected in pursuance of the terms of an act of parliament obtained in 1784, at an expense of £14,000. Here are various literary societies and libraries, public baths, and a theatre, which is occasionally opened. Assemblies are held occasionally in a suite of rooms lately erected. A little lower than the present bridge are the ruins of a very ancient one. The population in 1801 was 9030; in 1811, 9247, of whom 5010 were females, and 4237 males; in 1831, 10,144; and in 1831, 12,613. A. P., £34,117.

Fairs, Trade, &c.—Wednesday and Saturday are market-days. Fairs for cattle, cheese, wool, and pedlery, are held on May 1st, July 5th, August 11th, and October 10th. There are few manufactures of any consequence. Sail-cloth, cordage, and cotton cloth, are made to some extent, but the chief manufacture is that of cabinet work and upholstery, which are exported. Ship and boat-building are carried on to a considerable extent, but not so much so as formerly; vessels of 450 tons have been launched here. The trade is much impeded by the shoals in the Lune, which render it extremely difficult for vessels of 250 tons to approach the town. A dock has been formed at Glasson, about five miles below the town, which in some measure lessens the inconvenience, goods being brought up to the quay in lighters. The trade is partly coasting and partly foreign, and has been declining since the beginning of the century. The foreign trade is chiefly with America and the West Indies. In 1799, 62 vessels cleared outwards, with cargoes valued at upwards of £2,000,000; in 1826, 28 ships entered inwards, and 12 cleared outwards, on foreign trade. In 1800, the registered shipping of the port consisted of 140 vessels, whose tonnage was 19,094 tons; and in 1828, of 51, amounting to 5763 tons. The imports are colonial produce of most kinds, and the exports are mahogany furniture, saddlery, shoes, cottons, woollens, soap, candles, and provisions. In the immediate vicinity of the town is an excellent salt-marsh, extending over about 501 statute acres, and belonging to 80 of the oldest burgesses or their widows. The inland trade is much facilitated by the Lancaster canal, which has been described in our account of the inland navigation of the county, but the distance of the coal districts counterbalances the advantages which might otherwise accrue to the manufactures of the town from this source. This canal passes the Lune by an aqueduct, about a mile to the north-east of the town. This magnificent structure consists of five circular arches, the span of each of which is 70 feet, and the height above the water 39. The whole has a handsome cornice, and the union of elegance with stability has been considered in every part of the design. The total height, from the surface of the river to that of the canal, is 51 feet, and barges of 60 tons pass over it. It was erected under the superintendence of Mr Rennie; the foundation cost £15,000, and the whole undertaking not less than £48,000.

Government.—The first charter of incorporation was granted to Lancaster by Richard I., and confirmed by John and Edward III. This was renewed by Charles II., but subsequently superseded by a new charter granted in 1819 by George III. The corporation consists of a mayor, recorder, 7 aldermen, 2 bailiffs, 12 capital burgesses, 12 common-councillors, with a town-clerk, sergeants-at-mace, and subordinate officers. The freedom of the town is obtained by birth or servitude; the freemen have a voice in the election of one of the bailiffs; other vacancies in the corporation are filled up by the members themselves. The mayor is coroner for the borough, and justice of peace within the county; the aldermen are justices of peace in the borough. They hold courts of quarter-session for all offences not capital; a weekly court of pleas for the recovery of debts; and, on the first Wednesday of every month, a court for the hundred of Lonsdale. The town-hall, which was erected in 1781, is a handsome building. Twice a year the court of common pleas for the duchy is held here. The assizes and general county-sessions are also held here. The borough has a small gaol, in which prisoners are occasionally detained before being sent to the castle. The latter contains the shire-hall, the court-rooms, the nisi-prisus court, the grand jury-room, with well-arranged divisions for the classification of prisoners, work-rooms, day-rooms, airing-courts, and two tread-mills. The whole structure includes within the walls an area of 380 by 350 feet. The walls of the ancient keep are of amazing thickness, and the apartments of uncommon dimensions. It received many important alterations, in consequence of the general act of parliament for improving prisons. It is now one of the most complete establishments of the kind in the kingdom, and is capable of containing nearly 5000 men. On the west and south sides of the castle are raised terraces, which form a very agreeable promenade, commanding an extensive prospect, including the windings of the Lune, the mountains of Cumberland, Westmoreland, and Yorkshire, and the bay of Morecambe. Lancaster was made a borough in the 23d of Edward I., but did not make regular returns till 1547. It returns two members to parliament. The electors are 693 in number. The mayor is the returning officer.

Churches.—The living is a vicarage, in the archd. of Richmond and dio. of Chester, rated at £41, and in the patronage of Oliver Martin, Esq. The church—which is ded. to St Mary—is an ancient structure, in the florid style of English architecture, consisting of a nave, aisles, and chancel. It contains some curiously carved stalls and screens of oak. The present tower was erected in 1759. There are some fine monuments in the interior, and in the churchyard stands a fragment of a cross, covered with Runie characters, and believed to be of Danish origin.—Connected with the established church are two chapels-of-ease, the livings of both of which are perpetual curacies, in the patronage of the vicar of Lancaster. St John's is endowed with £400 royal bounty, £400 private benefaction, and £800 parliamentary grant. The chapel was built by subscription in 1755.—St Ann's is returned at £104. The Rev. Robert Houseman erected the chapel in 1796.—The Society of Friends, Presbyterians, Independents, Baptists, Methodists, and Roman Catholics, have places of worship here.

Schools, &c.—Here is an ancient grammar school. The masters receive a salary from the corporation, and in addition a small quarterly payment from each scholar. Here is a national school for 120 girls; it was founded by subscription in 1820, and the scholars are taught reading, writing, and household work. In the united Blue-coat and national school for boys, 340 children receive education, and some are clothed; the income is derived partly from the original subscriptions in 1770 and 1817, and partly from £2000 navy 5 per cent. annuities, given in 1817 by Mr Matthew Pyper. Here are also a charity school for 60 girls, a Roman Catholic school for 80 children, and various Sunday schools. Here are numerous well-endowed almshouses, some of them of great antiquity. Here is the county lunatic asylum, an extensive and well-arranged establishment, founded in 1816. It accommodates upwards of 280 patients, who are properly classified. Here are also a house of recovery, a lying-in charity, and a dispensary. “Earl Roger of Poitiers gave, A. D. 1094, the church of St Mary, with some lands here, to the abbey of St Martin de Sagio, or Sees, in Normandy; whereupon a prior and Benedictine monks from thence were placed here, who, with three priests, two clerks, and servants, made up a small monastery, subordinate to that foreign house, which was endowed with about £80 per ann. After the dissolution of the alien priories, this, with the lands thereunto belonging, was an-nexed by Henry V., or his scottees, to the abbey of Syon in Middlesex. Here were also a house of Black friars, a house of Grey friars, and an hospital ded. to St Leonard."—Tanner's Not. Mon. Distance from London, 240 m. N.N.W.; from Preston, 22 m. N.N.W.

LANCASTER, (Duchy or), a hundred in the north-western part of the county of Gloucester. It contains 6 parishes, and the population in 1831 was 2356.

LANCAUT, a chapelry and township in the parish of Tidenham, hundred of Westbury, but locally in the hundred of Blidesloe, co. of Gloucester. Living, a perpetual curacy in the archd. of Hereford and dio. of Gloucester, rated at £20, and annexed to the rectory of Woolaston. Chapel ded. to St James. Distance from Chepstow, 2 m. N. Pop. returned with Tidenham.

LANCHESTER, a parish, partly in the western division of the ward of Chester, and partly in the north-western division of the ward of Darlington, co.-palatine of Durham. It comprises the chapelry of Ebchester, Esk, Mademaley, and Sateley, and the townships of Bensfield-side, Burnop with Hamsteels, Collierly, Comsay, Conside with Knitley, Billingside, Greenscroft, Heelyfield, Holmside, Ivestone, Kye, Lanchester, and Langby. The town of Lanchester occupies the site of a Roman station, the fortified part of which stood on an eminence in the vicinity. The rampart is in a great measure perfect, and incloses an area of about eight acres, now under cultivation. This is now most generally supposed to have been the station called Epiacum; but much doubt remains connected with the subject, Horsley considering it to be the Glambanta, or Glancester; Camden, Gale, and Hunter, regarding it as the Longovicum. The Walling-street passed through it, and numerous relics of the Romans have been found here.—Living, a perpetual curacy in the archd. and dio. of Durham, rated at £14 8s. 4d., returned at £145, and in the patronage of the bishop of Durham. The church is ded. to All Saints, and is an ancient building, in the early style of English architecture, and consisting of a nave, side aisle, and chancel, with a square embattled tower. The interior contains six carved oak seats, some ancient monuments and sculptures, and the windows present some antique specimens of stained glass. In this church "a college of a dean and seven prebendaries was founded by Anthony Beck, bishop of Durham, A.D. 1283. It was valued in the Lincoln taxation at £90 13s. 4d., but, in the 26th of Henry VIII. at no more than £49 3s. 4d., and was granted, 7th Edward VI., to Simon Weldbury and Christopher Moreland."—Tanner's Not. Mon. The Wesleyan Methodists have a place of worship here. The petty sessions are held here every alternate Friday, and a court for the recovery of debts under 40s. is held every six months. It is one of the polling-places for the members of the northern division of the county. Here is a free school with a small endowment. At Comsay are six endowed almshouses. Distance from Durham, 7 m. N.W. by W. Pop. of the parish, in 1831, 5076; of the township, in 1801, 708; in 1831, 574. A. P., £4,818.

LANCING, or LAUNISING, a parish in the hundred of Brightford, rape of Bramber, co. of Sussex, bounded on the south by the English channel, and on the east by the river Arun and Shoreham harbour. Living, a discharged vicarage in the archd. and dio. of Chichester, rated at £6 9s. 4d., and in the patronage of the bishop of Lincoln. Distance from Worthing, 2 m. E.N.E. Pop., in 1801, 451; in 1831, 695. A. P., £3,330.

LANDBEACH, a parish in the hundred of Northstow, co. of Cambridge. Living, a rectory in the archd. and dio. of Ely, rated at £10 1s. 3d., and in the patronage of Corpus Christi college, Cambridge. Church ded. to All Saints. Distance from Cambridge, 5 m. N. Pop., in 1801, 235; in 1831, 422. A. P., £2,762.

LANDCROSS, a parish in the hundred of Shebbear, co. of Devon. Living, a discharged rectory in the archd. of Barnstaple and dio. of Exeter, rated at £5 4s. 9d., returned at £40, and, in 1829, in the patronage of Lord Rolle. Church ded. to the Holy Trinity. The parish is beautifully situated on a peninsula, nearly surrounded by the streams of the Torridge and the Yeo. In 1608, Monk, afterwards general and duke of Albemarle, was born here. Distance from Bideford, 2 m. S. by E. Pop., in 1801, 50; in 1831, 96. A. P., £420.

LANDEWENACK, a parish in the western division of the hundred of Kerrier, co. of Cornwall. Living, a discharged rectory in the archd. of Cornwall and dio. of Exeter, rated at £11 16s. 10d., and, in 1829, in the patronage of Henry Coulson, Esq. Church ded. to St Lant. The Wesleyan Methodists have a place of worship here. Here is the Lizard point, the most southern part of England, on which are two light-houses and a signal station. Not far from this, steatite is found in abundance, and exported for the use of potters, especially the china-makers of Worcester. St Kynan's cave, in this neighbourhood, is a curious grotto formed by overhanging rocks on the shore. Distance from Helstone, 11 m. S.S.E. Pop., in 1801, 244; in 1831, 406. A. P., £1187.

LANDFORD, a parish in the hundred of Frustfield, co. of Wilts. Living, a rectory in the archd. and dio. of Salisbury, rated at £4 3s. 9d., returned at £140, and, in 1829, in the patronage of T. Bolton, Esq. Church ded. to St Andrew. Distance from Salisbury, 10 m. S.E. Pop., in 1801, 186; in 1831, 226. A. P., £1,039.

LANDGUARD, or LANGER FORT, in the parish of Felixstow, hundred of Colneis, co. of Suffolk. "For the defence of the town of Harwich, and the excellent ports of Harwich and Orwell, Landguard fort was built. It stands upon a neck of land, now joined to Walton Colneis in Suffolk; but the common tradition is, that the river Stour passed on the north side of it, and discharged itself into the sea about Honeley bay. The remains of the channel are to this day called fleets; and the ground, which the fort stands upon, juts out farther south than the town of Harwich."—Morant's Essex. It commands the sea from the entrance of Manningtree water. The fort, which has been recently enlarged, is supplied with fresh water, brought in pipes from Walton, about 3 m. distant. Distance from Harwich, $1\frac{1}{2}$ m. E.S.E.

LANE-END, a chapelry and market-town in the parish of Stoke-upon-Trent, northern division of the hundred of Pirehill, co. of Stafford. It forms an extensive township in conjunction with Longton, and is situated on the road from Newcastle to Uttoxeter, in the southern part of the district called 'the Potteries.' The inhabitants are extensively employed in the various branches of the manufacture of the finer kinds of earthenware and china. It is a flourishing and rapidly increasing place, and contained, in 1831, 1468 inhabitants. Wednesday and Saturday are market-days, the latter in particular being well supplied with provisions. Fairs are held on Feb. 14th, May 29th, July 23d, and Nov. 1st, for woollen cloth, hardware, and pedlery. Coal is abundant in the vicinity, as are also the materials for the earthenware manufacture. Mills for grinding flints are turned by a small stream, and a cut has been made communicating with the Trent and Mersey canal, thus opening an extensive line of communication with other parts of the kingdom. There are two well constructed market-houses. Living, a perpetual curacy in the archd. of Stafford and dio of Lichfield and Coventry, and in the patronage of Trustees. It was founded in 1764, is not in charge, and has endowments of £600 royal bounty, £1000 private benefaction, and £1500 parliamentary grant, with land for a parsonage house. The chapel was erected in 1796, and enlarged in 1828. Many of the sittings are free. The chapelry is soon to be erected into a rectory, and a new church has been built. The Independents, Methodists, Baptists, and Roman Catholics, have places of worship here. Here are a national and an infant school. A charity school for 40 children was founded and endowed in 1760 by John Bourne, Esq. The salary of the master is £15. Distance from London, 163 m. N.W.

Living, a perpetual curacy, rated at £14 5s., returned at £99, and, in 1829, in the patronage of the earl of Carlisle. Church ded. to St Mary Magdalene. In this parish is a subterranean chalybeate spring, called Gileland Spa, which was anciently known by the name of the Holy Well. It is now resorted to by numerous visitors during the summer season, for whose accommodation houses have been erected, and libraries, music-rooms, &c. founded. The scenery in the vicinity is remarkably beautiful. The name is derived from that of an abbey, the remains of which form an extensive and picturesque ruin. The nave of the church, which presents a mixture of early English and Norman architecture, has been formed into the present parish church. Parts of the cloisters, refectory, &c. yet remain, and are overgrown with ivy and other wild plants. The western gateway is still tolerably perfect, and consists of a richly sculptured circular arch, surmounted by a statue of St Mary Magdalene. In the cemetery, part of which has been laid out as a garden, are tombs of members of the Deere family. Bishop Tanner gives the following account of this abbey:—"Robert de Vallibus, lord of Gileland, built here, A.D. 1169, a monastery of the order of St Augustine, which was ded. to St Mary Magdalene, and endowed, at the suppression, (at which time were herein a prior and seven canons,) with the yearly revenue of £79 19s. The site was granted to Thomas, Lord Deere, at that time accounted patron or founder of this religious house, as being heir to Robert de Vallibus." This parish was crossed by the Roman wall of Julius Agricola. Here are traces of a castrum or station, supposed to have been called Amboglana, and to have been the headquarters of the Cohors Prima Ælia Dacorum. Many interesting antiquities have been found here, as altars, monuments, inscriptions, &c. Distance from Carlisle, 13 m. N. by E. Pop., in 1801, 1243; in 1831, 1550. A. P., £16,815.

LANGLEY (KING'S), a parish in the hundred of Dacorum, co. of Hertford. Living, vicarage in the archd. of Huntingdon and

dio. of Lincoln, rated at £8, and in the patronage of the bishop of Ely. In the church—which is ded. to All Saints—were buried Richard II., whose body was subsequently removed to Westminster abbey by Henry V., and Edmund de Langley, duke of York, and fifth son of Edward III., whose body having been first interred in the chapel of the priory, was removed hither at its dissolution. The name is derived from a palace founded here by Henry III., which has since disappeared. The Grand junction canal passes through this parish, in which is an extensive paper manufactory. "An house of friars preachers, near the royal palace here, is said to have been first founded by Roger, son of Robert Helle, an English baron, but certainly enlarged in buildings and increased in revenues by the munificence of the 1st, 2d, 3d, and 4th Edwards, so as to exceed all houses of this order in England, being valued, 26th Henry VIII., at £150 14s. 8d. Queen Mary restored this house to a prioress and nuns, who were dissolved, 1st Elizabeth, and the site was soon after granted to Edward Grimston."—Tanner's Not. Mon. Distance from Watford, 4½ m. Living, a vicarage in the archd. and dio. of Llandaff, rated at £14 13s. 9d., consolidated with the vicarages of Liys, Werni, and Penmarc, and in the patronage of the dean and chapter of Gloucester. There are two parish churches. The old church, which is one of the most ancient in Wales, contains some curious old monuments, and a gigantic figure of Prince Richard Hopkins. Two ancient crosses stand in the cemetery. On an ancient stone on the church-wall is an inscription, which is thus translated: "In the name of the most high God, the cross of our Saviour begins, which the king has erected to the memory of Sampson the abbot, and to Juthathel Artmarl, for the sake of their souls. May the cross protect me!" Attached to the church was a chapel to the Virgin, now much dilapidated. The new church is a handsome modern structure. The area of the parish is about 4516 acres. The town covers a large space of ground, and was formerly of much consequence and very populous. Numerous ruins attest its ancient importance. At Col-hugh are the remains of a harbour and quay. The old town-hall yet remains, but the gaol has been demolished. This was the seat of a celebrated college, which was at one time in such repute that there were 400 houses and 7 halls for the use of the students. It was founded in 508 by St Illtus, with a church and monastery. The ruins of the buildings are yet visible. In this seminary were educated Gildas the historian, Paulinus, bishop of Leon, Sampson, archbishop of Dol in Brittany, Talhaem the bard, and Talicon. The monastery was subsequently removed to Tewksbury, and at the dissolution its revenues were conferred by Henry VIII. on the see of Gloucester. Friday is market-day, and a fair is held 23d June. LAPFORD, a parish in the hundred of North Tawton with Winkley, co. of Devon. Living, a rectory in the archd. of Barnstaple and dio. of Exeter, rated at £15 1s. 10½d., and, in 1829, in the patronage of the Rev. J. Radford. Church ded. to St Thomas à Becket. Distance from Chumleigh, 5 m. S.E. Pop., in 1801, 587; in 1831, 700. A. P., £2,537.

LAPLEY, or LAPPELE, a parish in the western division of the hundred of Cuttleshene, co. of Stafford. Living, a vicarage in the archd. of Stafford and dio. of Lichfield and Coventry, rated at £5 12s. 3½d., returned at £148, and, in 1829, in the patronage of John Swinfere, Esq. Church ded. to All Saints. The school has a small endowment. "Here was an alien priory of Black monks from the abbey of St Remigius at Rheims, to whom it was given, in the time of Edward the Confessor, by Algar, earl of Chester, or Mercia. Upon the frequent seizures of this estate into the king's hands during the wars with France, the foreign abbot and convent determined, about 4th Richard II., to sell it to Thomas Cotterell, clerk, and to his assigns. But this seems not to have taken effect, for this cell coming to the crown upon the general suppression of this kind of houses, was given, by King Henry V., to Tong college in Shropshire, and so continued till the surrender of the same, it being granted as parcel of the possessions of that late college, 1st Edward VI., to Sir Richard Manners."—Tanner's Not. Mon. Distance from Penkridge, 3 m. W.S.W. Pop., in 1801, 196; in 1831, with the township of Wheaton-Aston, 1042. A. P., £1,576.

LAPSLÖDE, or LAPLEY-WOOD, a chapel in the parish of Bridford, co. of Devon. Chapel ded. to St Catherine; curacy not in charge. Distance from Chudleigh, 6 m. N.W. by N.

LAPWORTH, a parish in the Warwick division of the hundred of Kington, co. of Warwick. Living, a rectory in the archd. and dio. of Worcester, rated at £9 9s. 7d., and in the patronage of Merton college, Oxford. The church, which is ded. to St Mary, presents a mixture of the different styles of English architecture. The Independents have a meeting-house here. The parish is crossed by the Stratford-on-Avon canal. Here are two schools, in one of which 60 boys, and in the other 30 girls, are instructed, the revenues of which amount to about £412, arising from various benefactions. Distance from Henley-Arden, 3½ m. N.N.E. Pop., in 1801, 575; in 1831, 666. A. P., £4,036.

LARBRICK, a township with Little Ecdeton, in the parish of Kirkham, co.-palatine of Lancaster. Here is a chalybeate spring.

LARKBEARE, a small hamlet in the parish of Tallaton, co. of Devon.

LARKFIELD, a hundred in the lathes of Aylesford, co. of Kent, containing 14 parishes, and, in 1821, 6694 inhabitants.

LARKFIELD, a township in the above hundred, in the parish of East Malling.

LASENBY, in the parish of Kirk-Leatham, liberty of East Langbaugh, N. R., co. of York. "In the 18th year of Edward I., John de Lythegraynes, and Alice his wife, built in their manor here a chapel to the honour of the Blessed Virgin Mary, and herein established a chantry college, or hospital, for a master and six chaplains, whose revenues were valued, 26th Henry VIII., at no more than £9 6s. 8d. per annum."—Tanner's Not. Mon.

LASHAM, or LASHAM, a parish in the hundred of Odiham, Basingstoke division of the co. of Southampton. Living, a rectory in the archd. and dio. of Winchester, rated at £6 18s. 9d., and, in 1829, in the patronage of G. P. Jervois, Esq. Church ded. to St Mary. Distance from Alton, 3½ m. N.W. by W. Pop., in 1801, 164; in 1831, 236. A. P., £1,128.

LASKILL-PASTURE, a township in the parish of Helmsley, N. R., co. of York, containing 85 inhabitants.

LASSINGTON, a parish in the hundred of Dudstone and King's-Barton, co. of Gloucester. Living, a discharged rectory in the archd. and dio. of Gloucester, rated at £6 10s., and, in 1829, in the patronage of Sir William Guise, Bart.; the bishop of Gloucester presents each third time. The parish is crossed by the Hereford and Gloucester canal. Distance from Gloucester, 3 m. N.W. Pop., in 1801, 85; in 1831, 60. A. P., £968.

LASTINGHAM, a parish in the wapentake of Ryedale, N. R., co. of York. It contains the chapelry of Rosedale-West-Side, and the townships of Appleton le-Moors, Farndale, Hutton-le-Hole, Lastingham, and Spaunton. Living, a discharged vicarage in the archd. of Cleveland and dio. of York, rated at £17 7s. 6d., and in the patronage of the lord-chancellor. The church—ded. to St Mary—presents some fine remains of ancient architecture, supposed to be Saxon, and some fine remains of Norman architecture. "Odibald, or Edilbald, king of part of Northumbria, gave to Cedd, bishop of the East Angles, this place in order to found a monastery after the rites of that at Lindisfarne, A. D. 648. It is said to have been dedicated to the Blessed Virgin Mary; and being destroyed in the Danish wars, abbot Stephen, in the time of William the Conqueror, began to repair it, and to replenish it with religious, but he and they were soon after invited to settle at St Mary's in York."—Tanner's Not. Mon. The church, with the crypt under it, are the only remains of the house. Distance from Pickering, $7\frac{1}{2}$ m. N.W. Pop., in 1831, 1766; that of township, in 1801, 222; in 1831, 211. A. P., £579.

LASTOCK, a hamlet in the parish of Stoke Abbot's, co. of Dorset.

LATCHFORD, a hamlet in the parish of Haseley, co. of Oxford, containing 35 inhabitants.

LATCHFORD. See LACHFORD.

LATCHINGDON, or LACKINGDON, a parish in the hundred of Dengie, co. of Essex. Living, a rectory in the peculiar jurisdiction and patronage of the archbishop of Canterbury, rated at £37. Church ded. to St Michael. Distance from Burnham, 5 m. N.W. by W. Pop., in 1801, 354; in 1831, 451. A. P., £5116.

LATERIDGE, a hamlet in the parish of Iron-Acton, co. of Gloucester.

LATHBURY, a parish in the hundred of Newport, co. of Buckingham. Living, a curacy in the archd. of Buckingham and dio. of Lincoln, rated at £5 6s. 8d., and in the patronage of Christ church, Oxford. Church ded. to All Saints. Here was formerly a free grammar school, with exhibitions to Christ church, but the endowment was lost upwards of a century ago. The river Ouse bounds the parish on several sides. Here was anciently a monastery, of which we find no account; the manor-house stands on its site. Distance from Newport-Pagnell, 1 m. N. Pop., in 1801, 189; in 1831, 172. A. P., £3,859.

LATHOM, a township in the parish of Ormskirk, hundred of West Derby, co.-palatine of Lancaster. Here is a school, in which 40 poor children of Lathom and Newburgh receive gratuitous instruction; the endowment amounts to £52 per annum. Another school has been founded, and is supported by Lord Skelmersdale. Here is a chapel, attached to Lathom-house. A market and fair, which have been discontinued, were granted by Edward I to Robert de Lathom. Here is a saline chalybeate spring. Lathom-house, the seat of Lord Skelmersdale, situated in the middle of an extensive park, was erected in the middle of last century, after designs by Leoni. It is a stately Grecian structure, 156 feet in length by 75 in breadth. The chapel and the stables stand in the park. On this site was the ancient mansion of the Lathom family, a strongly fortified castle, surrounded by a moat 24 feet broad and six deep, with an outer barrier of palisadoes. It was defended in 1644 by the countess of Derby, with 300 men, against Sir Thomas Fairfax, with 2000 of the parliamentary troops. The siege continued for 3 months, and was finally raised by Prince Rupert; but in the next year, General Egeron, with 4000 men took it, and at the command of the parliament dismantled the fortifications. It is said that the besiegers lost not fewer than 2000 men, and the castle was finally taken only by the failure of ammunition within its walls. The outer wall had nine towers, on each of which six pieces of artillery were mounted. Distance from Ormskirk, 4 m. N.E. by E. Pop., in 1801, 2179; in 1831, 3272. A. P., £14,267.

LATIMERS, or ISELHAMPTSTEAD-LATIMERS, a chapelry in the parish of Cheesham, hundred of Burnham, co. of Buckingham. Living, a donative rectory, rated at £5 6s. 8d., and, in 1820, in the patronage of the duke of Bedford. Chapel ded. to St Mary Magdalene. Pop. returned with Chesham, from which it is distant 8 m. S.E. by E.

LATTON, or LACTON, a parish in the hundred of Harlow, co. of Essex. Living, a vicarage in the archd. of Middlesex and dio. of London, rated at £7, and, in 1829, in the patronage of M. Burgoyne, Esq. "Here was a priory of Black canons, whose founder and time of foundation are not yet discovered; but it must have been in being before 20th Edward I., because it is mentioned in the Lincoln taxation. It was ded. to St John the Baptist, and granted, 28th Henry VIII., to Sir Henry Parker."—Tanner's Not. Mon. Distance from Harlow, $1\frac{1}{2}$ m. W.S.W. Pop., in 1801, 279; in 1831, 319. A. P., £3,273.

LATTON, a parish in the hundred of Highworth, Cricklade and Staple, co. of Wilts. Living, a vicarage, rated at £9 3s. 4d., returned at £146 8s. 6d., and, in 1829, in the patronage of the earl of St Germans. Church ded. to St John the Baptist. Here was found a tessellated pavement. Distance from Cricklade, $1\frac{1}{2}$ m. N. Pop., in 1801, 349; in 1831, 360. A. P., £3,213.

LAUGHARNE, or LLACHARN, a parish in the hundred of Derllys, co. of Carmarthen, South Wales. Living, a vicarage in the dio. of St David's, rated at £7. The prebend of Laugharne, which is impropriated by the see of Winchester, is rated at £45. Subordinate to the vicarage are the chapels of Cygff and Marros, with the rectory of Llan-Sadwrnen. The name of this parish was anciently Aber-Cowen, or Aber-Coran, which afterwards was changed to Tal-llacharn, subsequently corrupted into Laugharne; which some, however, assert to have been assumed from the castle having been taken in 1644 by General Laugharne. Twelve children of the parish receive gratuitous instruction on an endowment of £6 per annum. The area of the parish is about 600 acres. Pop., in 1831, 2020. A. P., £2,615.

LAUGHARNE, a market-town and seaport in the above parish. It is situated on an estuary, near the mouth of the rivers Tawe and Cowen. The port has no trade of any value. The town is incorporated under an ancient charter, and is governed by a portreeve, recorder, aldermen, attorneys, four constables, and 76 burgesses. In the reign of King John, Sir Guido de Brian the younger, granted lands and a share in commons to the corporation, which they still possess. The petty-sessions for the district are held here. Friday is market-day; and fairs are held on May 6th and September 28th. Here are many remains of ancient trifications, and the ruins of the castle of Guido de Brian, built in the reign of Henry III. Not far off are the remains of Roche castle, with respect to which history is silent. This was the birth-place of Josiah Tucker, D.D., dean of Gloucester. Distance from London, 245½ m. W. Pop., in 1831, 1433. A. P., £2,133.

LAUGHTERTON, a township in the parish of Kettlethorpe, co. of Lincoln.

LAUGHTON, a parish in the hundred of Gartree, co. of Leicester. Living, a rectory in the archd. of Leicester and dio. of Lincoln, rated at £10 10s. 5d., and, in 1829, in the patronage of the marquess of Hertford. Church ded. to St Luke. The Grand Union canal bounds the parish on the south. Distance from Market-Harborough, 5 m. W. by N. Pop., in 1801, 162; in 1831, 164. A. P., £1,746.

LAUGHTON, a parish in the wapentake of Aveland, parts of Kesteven, co. of Lincoln. Living, a vicarage not in charge. The church has long been in ruins, and the living united to the rectory of Falkingham. Distance from Falkingham, 2 m. S.W. by S. Pop., in 1801, 29; in 1831, 75. A. P., £1,800.

LAUGHTON, a parish in the wapentake of Corringham, parts of Lindsey, co. of Lincoln. It comprises the township of Laughton and the hamlet of Wildsworth. Living, a vicarage in the archd. of Stow and dio. of Lincoln, rated at £12, returned at £140, and, in 1829, in the patronage of the marchioness of Hertford. Church ded. to All Saints. The Wesleyan Methodists have a chapel here. Distance from Gainsborough, 6 m. N. E. by N. Pop., in 1831, 441: of the township, in 1801, 346; in 1831, 309. A. P., £3,363.

LAUGHTON. See LAUGHTERTON.

LAUGHTON, a parish in the hundred of Shipilake, rape of Poveysey, co. of Sussex. Living, a discharged vicarage in the archd. of Lewes and dio. of Chichester, rated at £9 11s. 3d., and, in 1829, in the patronage of the earl of Chichester. Distance from Lewes, 6 m. E. by N. Pop., in 1801, 539; in 1831, 804. A. P., £4,044.

LAUGHTON-EN-LE-MORTHEN, a parish, partly in the liberty of St Peter of York. E. R., and partly in the wapentake of Standerth and Tickhill, W. R., co. of York. It includes the chapelry of Letwell and the townships of Laughton, Gilden-wells, Throapham, and Woodsetta. Living, a discharged vicarage, a peculiar of the chancellor of York cathedral, rated at £6 13s. 4d., returned at £44. Church ded. to All Saints. It presents a fine specimen of early English architecture. It has a tower and spire which rise to an altitude of 195 feet, and are visible at a distance of 60 miles. Here is a school with a small endowment. The Independents have a place of worship here. Distance from Worksop, 5 m. N.W. Pop., in 1831, 1232; that of the township, in 1801, 465; in 1831, 780. A. P., £1,221.

LAUNCELLS, a parish in the hundred of Stratton, co. of Cornwall. Living, a vicarage in the archd. of Cornwall and dio. of Exeter, rated at £10 10s. 10d., returned at £110, and, in 1829, in the patronage of L. W. Buck, Esq. Church ded. to St Andrew. Here was a cell to the abbey of Hertland. The parish is crossed by the Bude and Holsworthy canal. Here are small almshouses. Distance from Stratton, 1 m. E.S.E. Pop., in 1801, 647; in 1831, 848. A. P., £3,926.

LAUNCESTON, a borough, parish and market-town, in the hundred of East, co. of Cornwall, but having separate jurisdiction. It was anciently called Dunhevid, and some antiquarians consider the present name to be a corruption of Llan Stephen, or St Stephen's church, while others refer it to the word Llan-cester-ton, i. e. church-castle-town. The latter appears the more probable. Before the conquest this manor was the property of the earls of Cornwall, whose jurisdiction extended over the honour of Launceston, including a large part of the county. "There was a college of secular canons before the conquest, in the church of St Stephen, about half a mile from this town, which being given to the bishop and church of Exeter by King Henry I., was suppressed before A.D. 1126, by William Warlewast, bishop of Exeter, who, in lieu of it, founded in the west suburb under the castle-hill, a priory for canons of the order of St Austin, which was also ded. to St Stephen, to which he gave the best part of the college lands. The yearly revenues of this monastery were rated, 26th Henry VIII., at £392 11s. 2d."—Tanner's Not. Mon. The castle was rebuilt about this time by Reginald, earl of Cornwall, and always continued annexed to the earldom, and subsequently to the duchy. The castle was alternately in the hands of the parliament and of the royalists, during the civil war, and from its situation was considered a post of considerable importance. It belongs to the crown, or prince of Wales as duke of Cornwall, but is now in ruins, with the exception of the keep, which is used as a prison.

General Description.—The town stands in an agreeable situation on the side of a hill, near the brook Attery, which falls into the Tamar. The hill is crowned by the remains of the castle. The streets are ill paved and narrow, but contain good houses, and the supply of water is good. Here are some literary and philosophical societies, book-clubs, and a library; and assemblies, concerts, &c., are occasionally held. The borough is more extensive than the parish. The inhabitants were formerly employed to a considerable extent in the manufacture of sugar, but this has declined. A considerable number of females are employed in spinning wool. Thursday and Saturday are market-days; the former for butcher's meat, the latter for corn and provisions in general. The fairs, chiefly for cattle of various descriptions, are held on Whit-Monday, July 5th, November 17th, December 6th; first Thursday in March, and third Thursday in April, free of toll; and on May 12th, July 31st, and September 25th, in the parish of St Stephen. The Bude canal sends a branch into the vicinity, which has been found to improve the trade. The town was made a free borough in the reign of Henry III., by the earl of Cornwall, but the charter of incorporation dates no farther back than 1555, when the government was vested by Queen Mary in a mayor, eight aldermen, a recorder, and a few freemen, who elect each other, and fill up vacancies in their own body without participation of the inhabitants in general. The mayor, late mayor, an alderman and recorder, or his deputy, are justices of the peace, and hold two sessions annually. The corporation is also entitled to hold a weekly court of pleas, for the recovery of debts to any amount. The county magistrates meet here on the first Tuesday of every month, to hold petty sessions for the hundred of East. The assizes for the county are held alternately here and at Bodmin. The borough returned two members to parliament from the reign of Edward I. until deprived of one by the Reform act. The voters, formerly only 17, are now above 320 in number. Lancaster is one of the polling places for the members for the eastern division of the county.

Living.—Living, a perpetual curacy in the archd. of Cornwall and dio. of Exeter, not in charge, returned at £112, and in the gift of the corporation. Church ded. to St Mary Magdalene. It is a curious structure of considerable antiquity, in the later style of English architecture, built of square blocks of granite, and covered with carving. The Independents and Wesleyan Methodists have meeting-houses here. Here was formerly an endowed grammar-school, founded by Queen Elizabeth; but several years ago it was given up. Here are two charity schools for 48 children of both sexes, supported by subscription. The reigning sovereign holds the title of Viscountess Launceston. "Here were," says Tanner, "an hospital for lepers, ded. to St. Leonard, and a friery." Distance from London, 214 m. W.S.W. Pop., in 1801, 1483; in 1831, 2231. A.P., £3,900.

Church ded. to St Mary. A market was formerly held on Tuesday; an annual fair is still held on the Tuesday before Easter. "Here was an abbey of Premonstratensian order, built and endowed by John de Bidun, about the latter end of King Henry Second's reign, to the honour of St Mary and St John the Baptist. Herein were, a little before the dissolution, ten or eleven canons, whose yearly income was rated at £91 8s. 3d. The site of this monastery was granted, 35th Henry VIII., to Sir Edmund Peckham."—Tanner's Not. Men. Distance from Olney, 2½ m. N.E. Pop., in 1801, 544; in 1831, 664. A. P., £3,302.

LAVENHAM, or LANHAM, a market-town and parish in the hundred of Babergh, co. of Suffolk. The town occupies an agreeable situation on the sides of a valley, through which flows the river Brett, and is remarkable for the salubrity of the air. It consists of a few small streets, containing scarcely any good houses, and not paved. Lavenham is one of the polling-places for the members for the western division of the county. It was formerly incorporated and governed by six capital burgesses; but this has been given up, and the town is under the jurisdiction of the county magistrates, who hold their meetings here, and particularly of the rector of the parish, who possesses magisterial authority. The lord of the manor holds occasional courts leet and baron. The only manufactures are the combing and spinning of wool, which are carried on to a trifling extent. The town was formerly noted for the manufacture of blue cloths, which has declined. The market was held on Tuesday, but it has fallen into disuse. A stone cross stands in the centre of the market-place. Fairs are held on Shrove-Tuesday, and from the 10th to the 13th of October. Estates within this manor descend to the youngest son, according to the custom of Borough-English. Pop., in 1801, 1776; in 1831, 2107. A. P., £3,755.

Living, a rectory in the archd. of Sudbury and dio. of Norwich, rated at £20 2s. 11d., and in the patronage of Gonville and Caius college, Cambridge. The church, which was erected on the site of a more ancient edifice, in the 15th century, is ded. to St Peter. It is in the later style of English architecture, and is covered with ornaments. The roof is most beautifully carved, and two pews, belonging to the earl of Oxford and the Spring family, are carved in an elaborate style, similar to the carved work in Henry Eighth's chapel at Westminster. In the windows there are considerable remains of ancient stained glass. The porch is of highly ornamented architecture, and is adorned with armorial bearings; it is supposed to have been added to the original structure by John, 14th earl of Oxford. Here are meeting-houses belonging to Independents and Wesleyan Methodist congregations. Thirty almshouses are endowed with land producing £186 per annum. Here is a free grammar school with a small endowment, for which five boys receive education. Here are also two national schools, endowed with £53 17s. 6d. per annum. Distance from London, 63 m. N.E.

LEAMINGTON-PRIORS, a parish in the Kenilworth division of the hundred of Knightlow, co. of Warwick. This town is situated on the river Leam, from which it derives its name; the adjunct Priors, which distinguished it from Leamington-Hastings, was derived from its having been formerly a dependency of the priory of Kenilworth. This place has lately become celebrated for its mineral waters, and in consequence has risen in importance with great rapidity, so that since 1801, its population has increased sixteen and a half fold. The town stands in a fine country, in an open vale sheltered by wooded hills, and consists of spacious, well-paved streets, lighted with coal-gas, and well-supplied with water. The houses are in general handsome, constructed of brick, and faced with Roman cement. Many families of distinction have erected houses and villas in the town and vicinity. There is a handsome stone-bridge over the river Leam, and the Avon flows in the immediate vicinity.

Baths, Public Buildings, &c.—The waters of Leamington are of three kinds, sulphureous, saline, and chalybeate, of which the saline is the most celebrated, and is composed of 5,760 parts of water, 7.83 sulphate of soda, 53.75 muriate of soda, 28.64 muriate of lime, 20.16 muriate of magnesia. The old well is saline, and has been known for some centuries. It is described by Sir William Dugdale in his history of the county, and was analysed, but very imperfectly, so early as 1688. It has been inclosed by Lord Aylesford, and a pipe carries a supply of water to the outside of the building, for the use of the poor. The Royal spa is contained in a handsome Doric building, situated on the banks of the river, in the midst of elegant gardens. In the interior are baths of various kinds, with a handsome pump-room, in which company promenade, and where a band of music attends at stated periods. This hall is 85 feet long, by 36 wide. There is a supply both of saline and of sulphureous water. Besides these, there are other establishments of a similar kind, in most instances well-arranged. We may name the Imperial fount, Wise's, Robin's, and Smith's baths. Many persons visit Leamington for a short time during the season, and, in consequence, lodging houses and hotels are numerous, and adapted for visitors of every class. There are also superb houses which are let furnished at high rents. The first hotels are the Regent's, and Royal, or Copp's. Annexed to these are handsome lodging-houses, with every accommodation. In Bath-street is a handsome Grecian structure, containing reading-rooms, library, and assembly-rooms, with card and refreshment rooms, fitted up in a most elegant style. In the Union parade are the upper assembly rooms, with the usual appendages. The ball-room is 96 feet long, by 45 wide. Assemblies and concerts are held here regularly. Here is also a small theatre, open three times a week during the season. Other places of fashionable resort are Bisset's museum, Ranelagh gardens and the botanical gardens. The ladies of Leamington contribute £52 10s. to the sweepstakes at Warwick races, and the gentlemen give a cup of the same value to be run for. On Wednesday is held a customary market for provisions. Coal and other articles are brought on the Warwick and Knapton canal, which passes the town. The local police is under the superintendence of commissioners, appointed under a recent act of parliament.

Living.—Living, a discharged vicarage in the archd. of Coventry, and dio. of Lichfield and Coventry, rated at £6 10s., returned at £141 5s., and, in 1829, in the patronage of the Rev. H. Wise. The church, which is ded. to All Saints, is an ancient structure in the decorated style of English architecture, originally erected as a chapel-of-ease to the parish of Wootton. There is a chapel in the upper town licensed, but not consecrated. The Roman Catholics, Independents, and Wesleyan Methodists, have places of worship here. Here are national schools for boys and girls, and free baths for the use of the poor. Distance from Warwick, 2½ m. E.; from London, 90 m. N.W. Pop., resident in 1801, 315; in 1831, 6209. A. P., £8,826.

LEAP, a tithing in the parish of Exbury, New Forest division of the county of Southampton.

LEARCHILD, a township in the parish of Edlingham, co. of Northumberland, containing in 1831, 20 inhabitants.

LEASINGHAM, or LEESINGHAM, (NORTH AND SOUTH), two united parishes in the wapentake of Flaxwell, parts of Kesteven, co. of Lincoln. The united rectories, rated at £23 18s. 1½d., are in the archd. and dio. of Lincoln, and, in 1829, in the patronage of Sir J. H. Thorold, Bart. The church of North Leasingham, ded. to St John the Baptist, has been demolished; that of South Leasingham is ded. to St Andrew. The livings were consolidated in 1726. Distance from Sleaford, 2 m. N.N.W. Pop., in 1801, 215; in 1831, 368. A. P., £3,034.

LEASOWES, a hamlet in the parish of Hales-Owen, co. of Salop, chiefly remarkable for having been the birth-place and residence of the poet Shenstone.

LEATH, a ward of Cumberland, bordering on Durham. It contains 21 parishes, 7 chapelries, 56 townships, and 1 hamlet. Pop., in 1831, 27,373.

LEATHERHEAD, a parish in the hundred of Copthorne and Effingham, co. of Surrey. Living, a discharged vicarage in the archd. of Surrey and dio. of Winchester, rated at £14 6s. 0½d., and in the patronage of the dean and chapter of Rochester. The church is an ancient structure, attributed to the reign of Edward I., and ded. to St Mary and St Nicholas. It is a cruciform building, consisting of a nave, chancel, and transepts, with lateral aisles and vestry. The nave and aisles are in the early, the chancel in the decorated, and the tower and north transept in the florid, style of English architecture. The town stands on the river Mole, here crossed by a bridge of 14 arches, in the vicinity of wild and highly picturesque scenery. It derives some advantage from its situation as a thoroughfare on the road from London to Guildford and Farnham, but its trade and manufactures are insignificant. A market was formerly held here, but fell into disuse above a century ago. A large fair for cattle of all kinds is held on the 10th of October, in a field on the north side of the town. Here is a place of worship for the Independents.

In the vicinity are many gentlemen's seats. The free school has an endowment of £15 per annum, for which 10 boys are educated. Distance from London, 18 m. S.W. by S. Pop., in 1801, 1078; in 1831, 1724. A. P., £5,601.

LEATHLEY, a parish in the wapentake of Clare, W. R. of the co. of York. Living, a rectory in the archd. and dio. of York, rated at £7 2s. 8½d., and in the patronage of the lord-chancellor. Here is a school free to all children, endowed with £12 per annum in 1769, by Anne Hitch. Distance from Otley, 3 m. N.E. by E. The parish, with the townships of Leathley and Castley, contained, in 1831, 413 inhabitants. That of the township, in 1801, 284; in 1831, 295. A. P., £2,472.

LEATHWAITE, a chapelry in the parish of Kirk-Ireth, hundred of Lonsdale, co. of Lancaster. Distance from Ulverstone, 5 m. N.W. Pop., in 1831, 190. A. P., £1,607.

LEATHWAITE. See DENNINGTON.

LEATON, a township within the liberty of the town of Shrewsbury, co. of Salop.

LEATON, a hamlet in the parish of Wolverhampton, co. of Stafford.

LEAVENING, a township in the parish of Adlam, E. R., co. of York. Here is a place of worship belonging to Wesleyan Methodists. Pop., in 1801, 176; in 1831, 354. A. P., £1,848.

LEAVINGTON (CASTLE), a township in the parish of Kirk-Leavington, N. R., co. of York. Here is said to have been a Danish fort of which no traces exist.

LEAVINGTON (KIRK), a parish in the liberty of Langbaurgh, N. R., co. of York. It comprises the townships of Castle-Leavington, Kirk-Leavington, Pictou, and Low Worsall, and contained, in 1831, 517 inhabitants. Pop. of the township, in 1801, 239; in 1831, 223. A. P., £2,707. Living, a curacy in the archd. of Cleveland and dio. of York, rated at £21 6s., returned at £30, and in the patronage of the archbishop of York. The church is a small ancient building, ded. to St Martin. Distance from Yarm, 8 m. S.S.E.

LEAVISHAM, a parish in the lythe of Pickering, N. R. of the co. of York. Living, a discharged rectory in the archd. of Cleveland and dio. of York, rated at £7 8s. 1½d., returned at £110, and, in 1829, in the patronage of Mrs Skelton. Distance from Pickering, 4½ m. N.N.E. Pop., in 1801, 123; in 1831, 168. A. P., £699.

LEBBERSTON, a township in the parish of Filey, N. R., co. of York.

LEBTHORPE, a hamlet in the parish of North Witham, co. of Lincoln.

LECHLADE, or LEACHLADE, a parochial market-town in the hundred of Brightwells-Barrow, co. of Gloucester. It stands near the confluence of the small river Leche with the Thames; and the name is derived from two Saxon words expressive of that cir-assistance. It is mentioned in Doomday-book, and appears to be a place of high antiquity. It has even been supposed to have been a Roman station, from the circumstance of some antiquities having been discovered in the neighbourhood; among the rest, a subterranean structure with tessellated pavements, conjectured to have been part of a bath. The town consists of a long and spacious street, containing some good houses, and partially paved and lighted. It stands on the road from Cirencester to London, and on the margin of the river Thames, which is here crossed by a bridge, which bounds the navigation of the river for vessels of 80 tons burden. The inhabitants derive considerable advantage from the situation at the highest navigable point of the Thames, as the produce of the counties of Gloucester and Wilts is brought hither to be transmitted to the metropolis. The Thames and Severn canal, which terminates here in the Thames, brings the supply of coal. The market is held on Tuesday, but is falling into decay. Fairs for cheese, cattle, and toys, are held on August 5th and 12th, and September 9th. The town is under the jurisdiction of the county-magistrates: the lord of the manor holds a triennial court-leet, at which he appoints a constable and tything-man.

The living is a vicarage in the archd. and dio. of Gloucester, rated at £12 13s. 4d., and, in 1829, in the gift of Mr Morton. The church is a handsome structure, in the later English style, ded. to St Lawrence, erected about 300 years ago. The Baptists have a meeting-house here. Here is a Sunday school with a small endowment. "A priory of Black canons, or rather an hospital of a master or prior, and certain poor and infirm brethren, ded. to St John the Baptist, was founded here upon a piece of ground called Lade, near the great bridge over the Thames—hence called St John's bridge—given to that good use by the lady Isabel Ferrers, sometime wife of Hugh Mortimer, before 30th Henry III. But this house being run into great decay, King Edward IV. gave his mother Cicely, duchess of York, leave to get it dissolved, and then to apply the revenues of it to the endowing of a perpetual chantry of three priests, at the altar of St Mary, in the parish church here, which continued till Dean Underwood, in the reign of Henry VII., found means to place two of these chantry priests at Wallingford college, and let the third remain at Lechlade; and so the site of this priory, as parcel of the possessions of Wallingford college, was granted to Dennis Tappes, 14th Elizabeth."—Tauner's Not. Mon. Distance from London, 76 m. W. by N. Pop., in 1801, 917; in 1831, 1244. A. P., £6,768.

LECK, a chapelry in the parish of Tunstall, hundred of Lonsdale, South, co.-palatine of Lancaster. Living, a curacy in the archd. of Richmond and dio. of Chester, rated at £2 2s., returned at £58 2s., and in the patronage of the rector of Tunstall. Distance from Kirby-Lonsdale, 2½ m. S.E. by E. Pop., in 1801, 319; in 1831, 326. A. P., £1,871.

LECKFORD, a parish in the hundred of King's-Sombourn, Andover division of the co. of Southampton. Living, a discharged vicarage in the archd. and dio. of Winchester, rated at £8 16s. 10d., and in the patronage of the prebendary of Leckford, Winchester. There is also a sinecure rectory, annexed to the prebend, rated at £9, returned at £130, and in the patronage of St John's college, Oxford. Church ded. to St Nicholas. The Andover canal passes here. Distance from Stockbridge, 2 m. N.N.E. Pop., in 1801, 199; in 1831, 231. A. P., £2,568.

LECKHAMPTSTEAD, a chapelry in the parish of Cheveley, co. of Berks. Living, a curacy, not in charge. Chapel ded. to St James. Pop., in 1801, 330; in 1831, 402. A. P., £1,675.

LECKHAMPTSTEAD, a parish in the hundred and co. of Buckingham. Living, a rectory in the archd. of Buckingham and dio. of Lincoln, rated at £15 13s. 4d., and, in 1829, in the patronage of J. Beauclerk, Esq. The church, which is ded. to St Mary, contains a curious ancient font. The school has a small endowment. Distance from Buckingham, 3½ m. N.E. by N. Pop., in 1801, 346; in 1831, 499. A. P., £2,797.

LECKHAMPTON, a parish in Cheltenham hundred, co. of Gloucester. Living, a rectory in the archd. and dio. of Gloucester, rated at £18 13s. 4d., and, in 1829, in the patronage of C. N. Trye, Esq. The church is ded. to St Peter, and contains some ancient monuments, one of which presents the effigies of a knight and lady. Here is a manor-house of the age of Henry VII. The parish includes part of the romantic Cotswold hills. A branch of the Cheltenham and Gloucester railway passes through this parish to Crippets, on the south. Distance from Cheltenham, 2½ m. S. by W. Pop., in 1801, 235; in 1831, 929. A. P., £1,819.

LECKONFIELD, a parish in the Hunsley-Beacon division of the wapentake of Hart-hill, E. R., co. of York. Living, a discharged vicarage in the archd. of the east riding and dio. of York, rated at £8, returned at £66 7s. 4d., and, in 1829, in the patronage of the earl of Egremont. The earls of Northumberland had anciently a strong castle here. Pop., in 1801, 316; in 1831, 301. A. P., £5,860.

LEDBURN, a hamlet in the parish of Mentmore, co. of Buckingham.

LEDBURY, a parish in the hundred of Radlow, co. of Hereford. It comprises the market-town of Ledbury and the township of Park-hold. It was anciently a borough, and returned members in the reign of Edward I., but the inhabitants pleading poverty, the franchise was withdrawn. Its fairs and market were first granted by Stephen, at the request of Betun, bishop of Hereford, but this charter became obsolete and was renewed by Elizabeth. The town—which consists of two principal streets, crossing each other at right angles, and of several small side streets—stands at the eastern angle of the county at the foot of the Malvern hills. The houses are generally built of brick, and of respectable aspect, the streets are partially paved and lighted, and there is a good supply of water. It takes its name from the river Leden, or Leddon, which flows about a mile to the eastward. The neighbourhood abounds in orchards and hop-grounds, in the cultivation of which, and in the making of cider and perry, the inhabitants are much engaged. Malting and tanning, with the manufacture of ropes and sacking, are carried on pretty extensively. About three centuries ago this place was famous for silks and broadcloths, but these manufactures have disappeared. Limestone and marble are found in the vicinity. Here is an ancient market-house. Tuesday is market-day; and fairs for cattle, cheese, wool, pigs, hops, &c., are held on Monday after February 1st, Monday before Easter, May 12th, June 22d, first Tuesday in August, October 2d, and Monday before St Thomas' day. The town is under the jurisdiction of the county magistrates, who hold a petty session for the hundred here every Wednesday. It is one of the polling-places for the county members. The lord of the manor holds annual courts leet and baron, at which constables are chosen. The Hereford and Gloucester canal passes the town. Pop., in 1801, 3058; in 1831, 3909. A. P., 14,783.

The living is a vicarage in the archd. and dio. of Hereford, rated at £14 12s. 6d., and, in 1829, in the patronage of the Rev. J. Watts. The rectory is divided into portions, of which the bishop is patron; the portionists alternately become patrons of the vicarage. The church is a fine old structure, partly in the Norman and partly in the early English style, ded. to St Michael. It contains a fine altar-piece and some handsome stained glass, with several interesting monuments. Here are places of worship for Independents, Baptists, and Wesleyan Methodists. Here are endowed schools for boys and girls; and another for boys, supported by the exchequer, and supposed to have been founded on the dissolution of a chantry. Here are several almshouses for poor persons, and a dispensary. "The rectory here was anciently divided into several portions, or prebends, as the prebend of Overhall, rated at £18 4s. 9½d.; the prebend of Netherhall, rated at £14, &c. But about A.D. 1400, a college for a master and eight secular priests was founded in the parish church, by John Trevenant, bishop of Hereford.—An hospital for a master, rector, or prior, and several poor brothers and sisters, was built here by Hugh Foliot, bishop of Hereford, to the honour of St Catherine, A.D. 1232, which met with several benefactors; but the revenues of it were valued, 26th Henry VIII., at no more than £22 5s. per annum, clear. It is yet in being, having been refounded by Queen Elizabeth, A.D. 1580, for a master, who is nominated by the dean and chapter of Hereford; seven poor men, widowers, and three poor widows, who are nominated by the master, and have each an allowance of £6 13s. 4d. per annum, besides clothes and firing."—Tanner's Not. Mon.

The senior canon of Hereford is generally master, and has a free farm of 70 acres, 40 acres of coppice-wood, an annual stipend, a free house and garden, and is required to reside here for two months in the year. In the vicinity are some noblemen's and gentlemen's seats. In the parish are some traces of fortified stations supposed to be Roman. Distance from London, 120 m. W.N.W.

Living, a curacy, with that of Broomfield, in the archd. and dio. of Canterbury, rated at £44 11s. 4d., returned at £72, and in the patronage of the archbishop of Canterbury. The church, which is ded. to St Nicholas, consists of a nave, chancel, and aisles, and has a large, but low square tower. "Robert de Crepito Corda, alias Crevecoeur, or Croucheart, Knt," says Tanner, "built here, A.D. 1119, a priory of Black canons, to the honour of St Mary and St Nicholas. It was endowed, 26th Henry VIII., with £362 7s. 7d., and granted, 4th Edward VI., to Sir Anthony St Leger." This priory and its church are said to have been no more than structures, which is confirmed by the remains.

A fortress is said to have been built here in 978 by Lodian, counsellor of Ethelbert II. The Lords Crevecoeur founded a castle here, to which additions were made by William Wykeham and Henry VIII. Parts of the ancient structure are yet visible in the castle of the family of Fairfax, which is said to be one of the finest in the kingdom. It stands in the middle of an extensive park, surrounded by a moat, and forms a quadrangular pile, composed of portions of various dates. A court-leet and baron is held for the manor, at which three horseholders are appointed. The manor is divided into six divisions or yokes. Distance from Maidstone, 5 m. E. by S. Pop., in 1801, 423; in 1831, 613. A. P., £4,307.

TOWN OF LEEDS.

Early History.—The earliest notice of this place has been placed by some topographers about the year 650, when it is supposed to have been made a royal ville. The Villa Regia mentioned by Bede, however, was not at Leeds, but at Osmundthorpe, 3 m. to the S. E. It is also noticed in doomsday-book. Here was a castle built by the Paganel, or Painels, who were meane lords of the place under the De Lacies, soon after the compilation of doomsday book. This castle was besieged in 1139 by Stephen, and, in 1399, served as a temporary place of confinement for Richard II. previous to his removal to Pontefract. Of this castle, no traces whatever now exist; but it stood very near the spot now occupied by the commercial buildings.

General Description.—The town is situated on the northern bank of the river Aire, on an eminence which rises gently from the river to the upper end of the town, sloping to the east, west, and south. It extends about a mile and a half from east to west along the river, which is crossed by two bridges of stone, one wooden bridge, and two suspension bridges. On the south side of the river are pretty extensive suburbs. The streets are lighted with oil and coal gas, paved, and watched; and the inhabitants have a plentiful supply of water, drawn from the river, purified and distributed in pipes whose ramifications extend all over the town. The streets are in general well built, though in the older parts of the town inconveniently narrow. The houses, for the most part, are of brick. The western part of the town is the most elegant, and is adorned with many handsome houses. The streets are generally kept in good order, and on each side is a flagged pavement for foot-passengers. Here are a theatre, public baths, assembly and concert-rooms, a music hall, and a bazaar. There are several subscription libraries; and in the commercial buildings, erected in 1826, are a news-room, hotel, and commercial offices. Here are a horticultural and a literary and philosophical society, and the Northern society for the encouragement of the fine arts has occasionally held its exhibition here. A fine infirmary was founded here in 1768, and opened in 1771. It is a large and handsome brick structure in the Roman style of architecture, in length about 150 feet, and 38 in depth. In 1788, this was considered by Mr Howard as one of the best regulated hospitals in the kingdom. The average number of patients treated in the house on the three years previous to 1816, was 764; and of the out-patients, 1675. Here are also a house of recovery for persons affected with infectious diseases, a lying-in hospital, and a guardian asylum.

Trade and Manufactures.—Leeds is situated in the midst of one of the most thriving manufacturing districts in the kingdom. It derives considerable advantage from the facility of communication with both sides of the island, to the west by the Leeds and Liverpool canal, and to the east by the Aire and Calder navigation to the Humber. As the canal joins the river Aire, the chain of communication is complete. In the time of Henry VIII., Leland speaks of Leeds as a "pretty market-town, subsisting chiefly by clothing, reasonably well-built, and as large as Bradford, but not so quick as it." Leeds is now the first mart in the kingdom for woollen cloths. It was formerly famous for no more than the coarser kinds of cloth, but these have in a great measure been supplanted by the superfine varieties. The manufactories are very numerous, and every part of the process is carried on in the highest degree of perfection, especially since some recent improvements in machinery were adopted. Many steam-engines are employed, and a large number of individuals are more or less directly supported by their connexion with the trade. There are two weekly markets held for the sale of cloth in an unfinished state. These are held in the cloth-halls, which were erected to remove the inconvenience arising from the exposure of goods to the risk of damage from bad weather, as was the case when the market was held in the open air. There are two halls, the one for the mixed or dyed, the other for the white cloths. The mixed cloth hall was erected in 1753. It is a large quadrangular building, inclosing an open area of 128 yards by 65. This is divided into six rows or streets, covered and well lighted from above; on each side of which are rows of stalls for the manufacturers, each of which does not exceed 23 inches in front. There are about 1800 stalls, and nearly the same number of master manufacturers, a few only having a double portion. The stalls are freehold property, which cost originally about £3 3, but they have risen in value, and now vary from £8 to £15. This, as well as the other hall, is under the management of fifteen trustees. The white or undyed cloth hall was erected in 1776. It covers a quadrangular space of 99 yards by 70, and contains 1200 stalls ranged in five double rows. These were originally valued at 30s., but have risen in value to £3 or £8. These halls are open only to persons who have served a regular apprenticeship to the cloth trade. The markets are held in the following manner:—At half-past eight in the morning in summer, and at nine in spring and autumn, and at half-past nine in winter the bell rings at the mixed cloth hall. This is the signal for the entrance of the manufacturers, who range their goods on their stalls, and take their stations behind them. As soon as the bell ceases, the buyers are at liberty to enter. In transacting business no person is allowed to speak above a whisper, and as the time is short, the negotiations between buyer and seller are generally effected in very few words. Vast quantities of cloth are thus disposed of, in many instances to the amount of £30,000 or £40,000 per week. At the end of an hour a bell rings, announcing the approaching termination of the market. A third bell rings in a quarter of an hour, and if any merchant be found in the hall after this bell ceases, he is fined 5s., and a similar sum for every five minutes he remains. In the W. R. of Yorkshire, which supplies this mart, there were manufactured from the year 1772 to 1781, including 2,009,972½ pieces of cloth, and in the period 1812—1821 inclusive, the number amounted to 4,521,742. The cloth is brought in a rough state to the halls, having annexed a leaden ticket, certifying that it has been inspected, and the fabric sound uniform. The manufacturers of mixed cloth reside chiefly in the villages to the westward of the town, and on the banks of the river Aire. The white cloths, on the other hand, are chiefly manufactured about Dewsbury and near the river Calder. Besides plain cloths, awandowns, toll-nets, kerseymeres, and various fancy articles are now manufactured in this district. Stuffs of various kinds, camblets, blankets, pelisse-cloth, shawls, shalpoons, bear-skins, socking, canvas, linen and thread, are made to a considerable extent. The cotton manufacture has been begun, but has not hitherto made much progress. From the immense demand for machinery used in the various manufactories, several foundries and engine-factories have been established, among which, that of Mr Murray was, some years ago at least, the largest in England excepting that of Messrs Boulton and Watt. Here are likewise extensive potteries and glass-works, also establishments for fulling, dressing, and drying cloth. There are some large tobacco manufactories, paper-mills, and chemical works. The king's mills are held by a grant from the crown, and all the inhabitants of Leeds are obliged to grind their corn there. Coal, slates, and flag-stones, as well as clay for fire-bricks and tobacco-pipes, are found in the vicinity. The following is a list of the number and power of steam-engines employed in Leeds in 1831:—

The market days are Tuesday and Saturday for general merchandise, corn, provisions, and such. There is a handsome corn-exchange at which the corn market is held. The market for butcher's meat is held in very commodious and extensive shambles opened in 1824. The fruit, vegetable, fish, and pig markets, are held on a very large plot of ground called the Free market. A fortnight fair for cattle is also held at the same place. Larger fairs for horses, horned cattle, hardware, &c., are held on July 10th and 11th, October 8th, and November 9th. The central market, opened in 1827, is completely covered in, and the interior is encircled with a beautiful gallery for stalls, &c. The south market on the south side of the bridge, which consists of a large and uniform range of shops round a cross in the centre, affords ample accommodation to the retail dealers; and the quarterly leather fairs, which are held here, are rapidly rising in importance.

Franchise, &c.—During the commonwealth, Leeds sent one member to parliament. In 1821, when Grampound was disfranchised, an abortive attempt was made to transfer the representation to Leeds. Under the Reform Act of 1832, Leeds now returns two members to parliament. The number of electors is about 6,700. The mayor is the returning officer. The amount of taxes paid is £18,800; the number of houses 27,600, of which 6,700 are of the rental of £10 or upwards. The number of houses has been more than doubled since the year 1811. The town was incorporated by Charles I., and is now governed under a modified charter granted by Charles II. The government is vested in a mayor, 12 aldermen, 24 common council-men, with a town-clerk, and other officers. The corporation fills up vacancies in its own body, and the aldermen elect the mayor from among themselves. The mayor and aldermen are justices of peace within the borough. They hold courts of quarter-session, and weekly courts for minor offences. They also appoint constables for the regulation of the town. The jurisdiction of a court-barron for the honour of Pontefract, and of a court of record, both for the recovery of debts under £5, extends to this borough. The quarter sessions for the W. R., and the petty sessions for Skyrack wapentake are held here. Here is a handsome court-house and town-prison. This building stands in Park Row, and was founded in 1811. The principal front is towards Park Row, and consists of a portico and two wings, the former having four Corinthian pillars in front, and the latter highly wrought pannels in relief, with fasces, wreaths, &c. On the sides of the vestibule are the rotation office, and the rooms of the magistrates of the W. R., which communicate with the post room, in which is an elevated stage for the public, capable of containing 800 persons. There are also galleries for ladies and the grand jury, rooms for counsel, retiring room for the jury, &c. Under the same roof are the guard-room, fire-engine store, gaoler's room, and thirteen cells for the temporary confinement of prisoners.

Ecclesiastical Affairs.—The living of the parish of Leeds is a vicarage in the archd. and dio. of York, rated at £38 0s. 2½d., and in the patronage of trustees. The church is an ancient structure, partly in the Norman style, ded. to St Peter. It is built in the form of a cross, with a central tower 96 feet high. The nave is the most ancient part, and dates from the reign of Edward III. The roof is painted in fresco by Parmentier, and over the altar is a painting of the Last supper. In the interior are some interesting monuments, especially one to Captains S. Walker and R. Becket, natives of Leeds, who fell at Talavera. The sculpture on this monument is from the chisel of Flaxman. Subordinate to the vicarage are several perpetual curacies. The churches are those of St James,—St John, founded in 1634, the living of which is in the patronage of the vicar and corporation,—St Paul, built in 1721, at an expense of £10,000, living in the patronage of the vicar,—Trinity, built in 1721, at an expense of £4,560, and in the joint patronage of the vicar, recorder, and minister of St John's,—St Mary, erected in 1824, at the expense of £10,951 15s. 4d.,—Christchurch, erected in the same year at an expense of £10,466 13s.: and St Mark, built in 1825, at the cost of £9,003. These three last were erected at the expense of the parliamentary commissioners, and the livings are in the gift of the vicar. Here are chapels for Arians, Baptists, Independents, Methodists, Revivalists, Swedenborgians, the Society of Friends, Unitarians, and Roman Catholics, amounting in all to about 21. The grammar school of Leeds, for instruction in classics and mathematics, is free to all boys in the parish. It was founded in 1552, and endowed with property which now yields £1600 per annum, of which £500 per annum are paid to the head master, £250 to the second master, and £60 to the usher. The scholars have a title to compete for one of Lady Hastings' exhibitions in Queen's college, Oxford, and in turn with other schools for scholarships in Emanuel and Magdalene colleges, Cambridge. Here is a charity school for 70 boys and 50 girls, to which children are admitted at 7 years of age, and may remain till 14. In the national school, founded in 1812, and supported by subscription, are educated 390 boys and 180 girls. There are numerous Sunday schools. Here are almshouses founded and endowed at different periods, in which upwards of 80 poor persons receive lodging and maintenance. They are severally called Harrison's, Parker's, Midgley's, Potter's, and Jenkinson's charities, from the names of the founders. Here are several dispensaries, a stranger's friend's society, &c.—In the vicinity are many picturesque spots: among the rest are the ruins of Kirkstall priory. The noble family of Osborne take the title of Duke from Leeds. In the vicinity a few Roman antiquities have been found, and on Quarry-hill are traces of a camp. Distance from London, 189 m. N.N.W.: from York, 25 m. S.W. by W. Pop., in 1801, 53,162; in 1831, 123,393.

LEEK, a parish in the wapentake of Allertonsliire, N. R. of the co. of York. It contains the townships of Borrowby, Crosby, Knayton with Brawith, Landmouth with Catto, Leek, and Gueldable. Living, a vicarage, a peculiar of the bishop of Durham, rated at £16. Church ded. to St Mary. The town was formerly flourishing, but being destroyed about the conquest, has never recovered, and now contains only the church, a farm-house, and 9 inhabitants. The parish school has a small endowment for the benefit of poor children. Distance from Thirsk, 6 m. N. Pop., in 1831, 1089. A. P., £408.

LEEK, a parish in the hundred of Totmonslow, co. of Stafford. It contains the market-town of Leek, and the chapelries of Endon, Onecote, and Rushton Spencer, and the townships of Bradnop, Longdon, Heaton, Leek-frith, Rushton-James, Rudyard with Caudery, Stanley, and Tittsworth. The town is of great antiquity, and became the property of the earls of Chester after the conquest. It has been called 'the capital of the Moorlands.' The town is situated on the small river Churnet in the midst of the Moorlands. It stands on the great road from London to Manchester, and consists of several well paved streets, lighted with gas, and well supplied with water. The inhabitants are chiefly employed in the silk line, the principal manufactures being handkerchiefs, ribbons, thrown silk, ferrets, and galloons. The manufacture of buttons formerly flourished, but is now declining. That of cotton goods is rising. Mines of coal, lead, and copper, are wrought in the neighbouring hills. Within half a mile of the town is a branch from the Trent and Mersey navigation. The market, which was granted by King John at the instance of one of the earls of Chester, is held on Wednesday. Fairs for cattle and pedlars' ware are held on February 7th, Easter-Wednesday, May 18th, Whit-Wednesday, July 3d and 28th, Wednesday after October 10th, Wednesday before Old Candlemas, and November 13th. Under the authority of the earl of Mansfield, lord of the manor, courts leet and baron are held, and a constable appointed. The petty sessions for the division are held here. Besides the ordinary markets and fairs, markets for fat cattle are held every second Wednesday between the 28th of July and Christmas.

The living is a discharged vicarage in the archd. of Stafford, and dio. of Lichfield and Coventry, rated at £7 9s. 1½d., and, in 1829, in the patronage of the earl of Mansfield. The church is an ancient structure, in the early style of English architecture, ded. to St Edward the Confessor. The Methodists, Independents, and Society of Friends, have places of worship here. Here is a free grammar school, but the endowment being very small only six boys are taught to read. Here are almshouses for eight aged women, founded in 1696 by Mrs Ash, and endowed with property, which, with some later benefactions, now yields £73 3s. 6d. per annum: £290 are annually distributed in charity from several endowments. Here was born Thomas Parker, afterwards earl of Macclesfield, lord-chancellor, and president of the Royal Society. His father an attorney here. Distance from London, 1 m. N.W. by N. Pop., of the parish, in 1810, 780; of the township in 1801, 3,489; 1831, 6,374. A. P., £10,041.

LEEK-FRITH, a township in the ab. parish. Distance from Leek, 5 m. N. by Pop., in 1801, 697; in 1831, 873. A. P., £4,958.

LEEK-WOOTTON, a parish in the Kenilworth division of the hundred of Knightlow, co. of Warwick. Living, a vicarage the archd. of Coventry and dio. of Lichfield and Coventry, rated at £5 12s. 1d., returned at £120, and, in 1829, in the patronage Chandos Leigh, Esq. The church is a modern building, ded. to All Saints. Here is an endowed school free to all children in the parish. Distance from Warwick, 3 m. N. by Pop., in 1801, 406; in 1831, 433. A. P., £3,37.

LEEMING, a chapelry in the parish of Burnaston, wapentake of Hallikeld, N. R. of the co. of York, containing the townships of Leeming, Exelby, and Newton. Living, perpetual curacy in the archd. of Richmond and dio. of Chester, rated at £5, returned at £43 6s. 2d., and in the patronage of the vicar of Burnaston. Church ded. to St John the Baptist. The petty sessions for the division are held here. The name, which in ancient British signifies a stone-way, was given to it from its being crossed by the ancient Herman street. Distance from Bedale, 2½ m. E. N. E.

LEEMING (LITTLE), a hamlet in the parish of Bedale, N. R. of Yorkshire.

LEES, a township in the parish of Dalbury, co. of Derby.

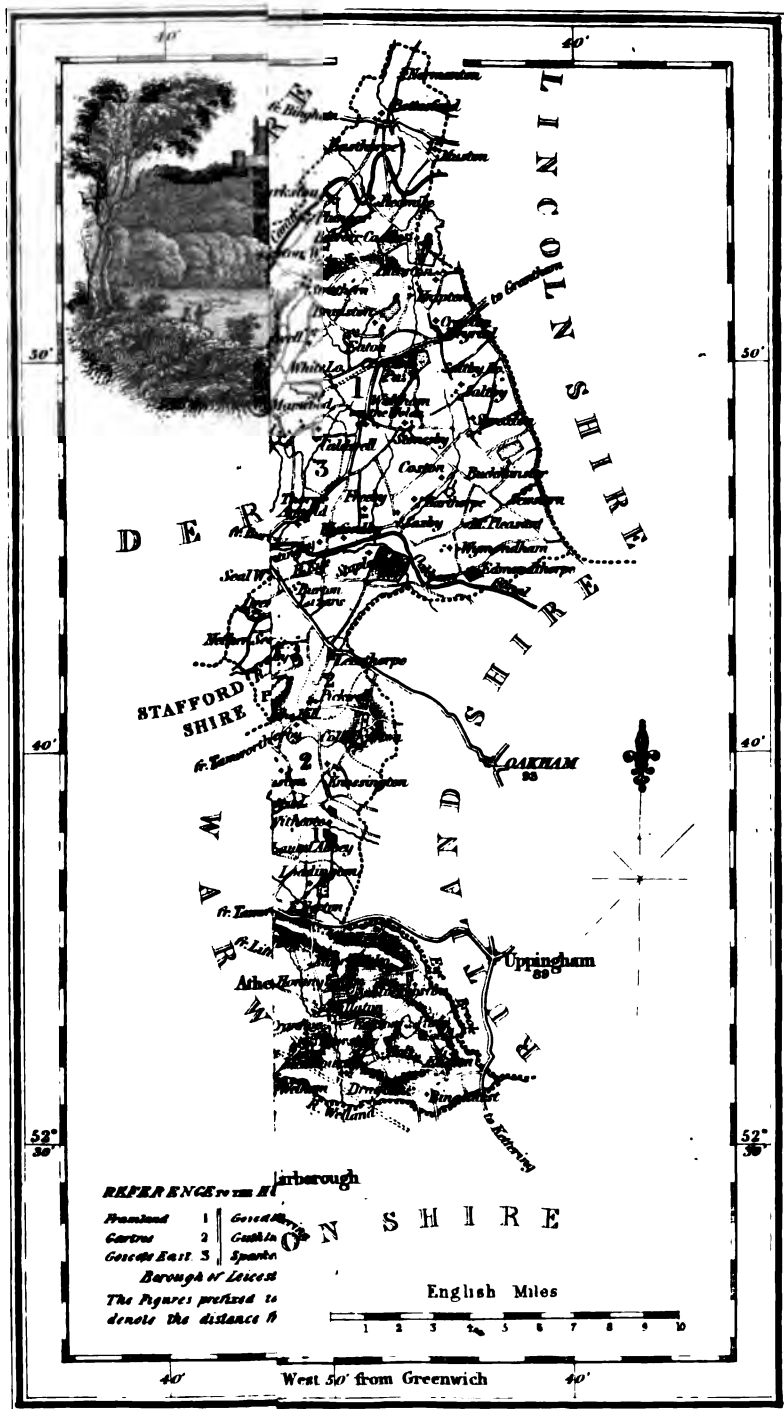

LEES, a hamlet and chapelry in the parish of Ashton-under-Lyne, co.-palatine of Lancaster. Living, a curacy in the archd. and dio. of Chester, not in charge, rated at £100, and in the patronage of the rector of Ashton-under-Lyne. Distance from Oldham, 1½ m. E.

LEESE, a township in the parish of Sandbach, co. of Chester. Distance from Middlewich, 2½ m. N.E. Pop., in 1801, 86; in 1831, 126. A. P., £976.

LEESTHORPE, a hamlet in the parish of Pickwell, co. of Leicestershire.

LEFTWICH, a township in the parish of Davenham, co.-palatine of Chester. Here is a charity school with a small endowment. Distance from Northwich, 1 m. S. Pop., in 1801, 899; in 1831, 1799. A. P., £2,828.

LEGBOURN, a parish in the Marsh division of the hundred of Calceworth, parts of Lindsey, co. of Lincoln. Living, a curacy in the archd. and dio. of Lincoln, rated at £26, returned at £96, and, in 1829, in the patronage of the Rev. R. Powley. Church ded. to All Saints. The Wesleyan Methodists have a place of worship here. "As early as A.D. 1150, there was a nunnery at Kariedale, Kedington, and Halington, successively—if they were not all the same place—which seems to have been removed to Lekeburn by Robert Fitz Gilbert of Lekeburn, or Tadwallie, before the first year of King John. Here were ten sons of the Cistercian order, whose revenues were rated, 26th Henry VIII., at £57 13s. 6d. This priory was ded. to the Virgin Mary, and granted, 32d Henry VIII., to Thomas Henegge." Distance from Louth, 3 m. S.E. by E. Pop., in 1801, 280; in 1831, 449. A. P., £2,175.

LEGSBY, a parish in the western division of the wapentake of Wraggoc, parts of Lindsey, co. of Lincoln. Living, a discharged vicarage in the archd. and dio. of Lincoln, rated at £6 4s. 2d., returned at £100, and, in 1829, in the patronage of Sir H. Nelthorpe, Bart. Church ded. to St Thomas the Apostle. Distance from Market-Raisen, 4 m. S.E. Pop., in 1801, 184; in 1831, 236. A. P., £1,923.

LEICESTERSHIRE,

An inland county of England. It is situated nearly in the centre of England, and is bounded on the north-west by the county of Derby; on the north by that of Nottingham; on the east by Lincoln and Rutland; on the south by Northampton; and on the west by Derby and Warwick. From these it may be stated in general to be divided by no natural boundaries, though short portions of the rivers Trent, Soave, Anker, Welland, and Avon, run along different portions of the boundary line. Its greatest length, from south of Lutterworth to the northern part of the vale of Belvoir, is about 45 miles; its breadth from east to west is about 40 miles; and the circumference about 150. Its superficial extent, according to the latest authority, is about 522,240 statute acres, according to which, it stands 26th among the English counties in point of size, but it has been reckoned as high as 560,000 acres.

History.—At the period of the Roman invasion, this county was inhabited by a tribe called Corani, or Coriast, and was soon incorporated with the province of Flavia-Cæsariensis. The Romans had several stations in this county, the principal of which were Ratas, at Leicester; Varnocetum, near Willeughby; Brenac, near High Cross; and Manchesseodum, at Manchester, on the borders of Warwickshire. Roads were constructed, connecting these with one another, and with other important stations, among which were the Watling-street, the Fosse-way, and the Via Devacæ. After the departure of the Romans, this county formed part of the Anglo-Saxon kingdom of Mercia, and the inhabitants were known by the name of the Middle Angles. It suffered much from the incursions, and was long under the dominion, of the Danes, who constituted Leicester one of their chief cities. After the conquest, this county was divided by William among his followers, and the former possessors were obliged to become the feudal dependents of the Norman chiefs, who secured their possessions by erecting many fortresses here. Among these were the castles of Leicester, Mount-Sorrel, Whitwick, Shilton, Grooby, Hinckley, Donnington, Melton, Ravenstone, Sauvey, and Thorpe; to which the castles of Belvoir and Ashby-de-la-Zouch were added at later periods. Most of the more ancient were destroyed on account of the rebellion of their owners in the reigns of Henry II., John, and Henry III. The most important events which occurred in this county are, the first promulgation of the doctrines of Wickliffe about the end of the 14th century; the holding of a parliament at Leicester, in 1414; the battle of Bosworth-field, in 1485; and various conflicts between the parliamentary and royalist parties in the reign of Charles I.

Population.—At the time of the Norman survey, the population of this county amounted to 34,000 persons; in 1700, it was 80,000; in 1750, 95,000; in 1801 there were 130,081; in 1811, 150,419; in 1821, 174,571; and in 1831, 197,003.

Divisions, &c.—In Domesday-book, Leicestershire is stated to be divided into four wapentakes; at present there are six hundreds, viz. Framland, Gartree, Goscote East, Goscote West, Guthlaxton, and Sparkenhoe. The market-towns are nine in number, viz. Leicester, Loughborough, Hinckley, Lutterworth, Melton-Mowbray, Market-Harborough, Market-Bosworth, Ashby-de-la-Zouch, and Mount-Sorrel. The county is in the province of Canterbury, and forms an archdeaconry to the diocese of Lincoln. It is divided into the deaneries of Akeley, Framland, Gartree, Goscote, Guthlaxton, and Sparkenhoe, which contain 213 parishes, but the number of places paying separate parochial rates is 323. Of the livings, 113 are rectories, 82 vicarages, and 18 curacies. This county is in the midland circuit, and at Leicester are held the assizes and quarter-sessions. The number of acting magistrates, in 1829, was 52. Four members of parliament are now returned for the county. Those for the northern division are elected at Loughborough; those for the southern at Leicester. The northern division includes the whole of the several hundreds of West and East Goscote and Framland, and also those detached portions of the hundred of Gartree which are situate on the east of the hundred of Goscote. The southern division comprehends the remaining parts of the hundred of Gartree, and the hundreds of Sparkenhoe and Guthlaxton; also the borough of Leicester and the liberties thereof.

Rates.—“The poor rates in Leicestershire,” says the writer of an article in the Edinburgh Encyclopædia, “in the year 1776, amounted to the sum of £26,360; in the year 1803, they had advanced to £107,568; the increase, therefore, was nearly as 10 to 40. In the same period, the poor rates of the whole kingdom had advanced in the ratio of 10 to 31, nearly; hence it appears, that they had increased in this county in rather a greater ratio than in the whole kingdom. The number of persons relieved in and out of work-houses, in the year 1803, was 19,154, besides those who were not parishioners. Each person relieved out of any work-house cost at the rate of £3 18s. 8½d. per annum; each person relieved in the work-houses cost at the rate of £11 4s. 6½d. per annum. The average expense per individual was £4 7s. 8½d. In 1801, the number of parishioners relieved from the poor rates appears to have been 15 per cent. of the resident population. The number of persons belonging to friendly societies appears, in 1803, to have been 8 in 100 of the resident population. One hundred of these societies had been enrolled according to act of parliament. In the year ending March, 1815, the amount of money raised by parochial rates in this county amounted to rather more than £140,150." For the year ending March 25th, 1827, they amounted to £138,182 15s., the expenditure to £138,904 17s., of which £117,962 2s. was applied to the relief of the poor. A. P., £902,217.

Face of the Country.—The general surface of Leicestershire is uneven, but not hilly or mountainous. The highest elevation is not above 800 or 900 feet above the level of the sea, so that no part of it is cold, nor is any part so level as to be unhealthy or ill-ventilated. The highest grounds are in the north-western parts of the Charnwood forest, where there are a few rugged hills of granite, from which there are extensive and beautiful prospects. The bottoms of the valleys are in general elevated about one or two hundred feet above the level of the sea. The face of the country is by no means destitute of wood, and there are many fine trees in the older hedge-rows.

Soil.—The soil of this county presents scarcely any varieties beyond those which are naturally produced by the different situations on rising grounds and in the valleys. It is generally loamy, and seems to form part of a great tract of red loam extending from Rutlandshire to the further extremity of Devonshire. The varieties of soil are the clayey loam, the sandy loam, and the peaty meadow soil. The general substrata are marl, clay, rock, or alluvial deposit.

Rivers.—The principal rivers of this county—which are little more than small streams—are the Soare, Swift, Welland, Avon, Wreke, and Anker. The Soare rises near the south-western border of the county, between Hinckley and Lutterworth: flowing in a northerly direction, it passes Leicester, Mount-Sorrel, and Loughborough; from Diskley it runs along the border of the county for seven or eight miles, and finally turns into Derbyshire and falls into the Severn. The channel of this river has been deepened from Leicester downwards, so as to be navigable for barges. On its course it receives the waters of the Wreke and of many smaller streams.—The Wreke rises in the hills near the borders of Lincolnshire, passes Melton-Mowbray, and runs in a south-western direction, falling into the Soare about 3 m. above Mount-Sorrel.—The Swift rises near the southern angle of the county, passes Lutterworth, and enters the county of Warwick.—The Welland rises near Harborough, runs along the boundary of the county to Rockingham, where it receives another small stream, and enters Northamptonshire.—The Avon skirts a portion of the southern boundary of the county, and a small portion of the north-western boundary. Thus the Soare, the Wreke, and the Welland, send their waters to the German ocean, while the other streams flow to the eastward.

Canals.—The artificial deepening of the river Soare has already been mentioned. This cut is upwards of 20 m. in length, and sometimes leaves the natural bed of the river for a short distance. It is navigable by such barges as can sail on the Trent, and gives off a collateral cut to Loughborough, whence a continuation has been made to certain collieries, both by cuts and railways. The river Wreke has been made navigable as far as Melton-Mowbray by artificial cuts, and communicates with the Oakham canal. The latter commences at Melton-Mowbray, and runs in an easterly direction for about 8 m., when it enters Rutlandshire, and advances a similar distance to Oakham. Within this county it has a rise of about 126 feet, but in Rutlandshire it runs on a level.—The Union canal rises near Leicester from the Soare navigation, and runs with a winding course in a direction nearly S. by E. as far as Harborough, near which it gives off a branch called the Derby and Leicester canal. It passes through several tunnels, and was originally intended to have passed to Northampton and to have joined the Grand junction canal.—The Ashby-de-la-Zouch canal enters the south-western side of the county near Hinckley, runs in a direction nearly N. by W., passes Market-Bosworth, and reaches Ashby-de-la-Zouch. It joins the Coventry canal at Nuneaton, and was originally intended to have been carried to the Trent, below Burton, but was stopped for want of funds, after an expenditure of £180,000.—The Grantham canal enters from Lincolnshire, runs along the vale of the Belvoir, and enters the county of Nottingham, after a course of about 10 miles in the present county.

Roads and Railways.—This county is crossed by the great road from London to Manchester, which passes Market-Harborough, Leicester, Mount-Sorrel, and Loughborough, by the road from London to Leeds, and by the Leeds mail-road from London, which passes Melton-Mowbray and Nether-Broughton. From the extremity of the Ashby canal a railway runs by the town of Ashby-de-la-Zouch to the Lount colliery and several lime-works, a distance of about 12 m. This passes over several embankments, and through a tunnel $\frac{1}{2}$ m. long, and was completed at an expense of £30,000. There is now in progress a railway, running in a north-westerly direction from Leicester towards Ashby-de-la-Zouch.

Climate.—The climate of Leicester is, on the whole, mild and very salubrious; and the harvest, especially in the western parts of the county, is at least ten days earlier than it is in the counties on the east coast of England. The average annual fall of rain is supposed to be about 30 inches.

Minerals.—Iron-stone is found in Ashby wolds, at the depth of six or eight yards, and is smelted in the vicinity, but is not found profitable. In the fissures of the lime rock at Staunton-Harold, a rich variety of lead-ore is found, and has been smelted with advantage. Coal is found chiefly in the north-western parts of the county near the borders of Derbyshire. The principal coal-works are those of Cole-Orton, Leunt, and Ashby-wolds. The latter were lately established by the marquess of Hastings, and yield a supply of excellent coal. The stratum is three yards in thickness, but the coal is raised at considerable expense, the pits being 200 yards in depth. In this county are two celebrated lime-works, those of Breton and Barrow-upon-Soare. Breton is situated near the borders of Derbyshire, in the hundred of West Goscote. "It is situated at the base of a high limestone rock, of a conical form, with the top seemingly cut off; the strata which compose the central parts of it—which are found nearly horizontal in the plain—are raised almost perpendicularly and placed on their edges, while those on each side decline like the surface of the hill. According to Dr Darwin, the Breton limestone consists of two parts magnesian earth and three calcareous." This mixture of magnesia renders the lime less adapted for the purposes of agriculture, and renders caution in its use very necessary. Cloud-hill, in the same vicinity, affords a similar variety of limestone. The limestone of Barrow-upon-Soare resembles in appearance and quality the clay-stone of Gloucestershire, which produces a very strong lime. It is found in thin strata, at the distance of three or four yards from the surface, and is much in demand, not only for the common purposes of measure and building, but for the construction of works under water, for which purpose much of it is exported. It was the only lime found successful in the construction of Ramsgate pier. In the substance of the rock many petrified shells, fish, &c. have been found. A singular limestone is found in the vale of Belvoir. Slate is found in abundance on the eastern side of Charnwood forest, and granite at Mount-Sorrel. These are used for the purposes of building, the latter also for the repair of roads. Freestone and brick-clay occur in most parts of the county.

Agriculture.—In 1811, when the number of resident families was 31,480, there were returned as employed in agriculture, 11,700. There are some very large estates, and most of the land is held by freehold. Many persons farm their own land; the rented farms seldom contain more than 200 acres. The greater part of this county is in grass. The parts under tillage lie chiefly to the north and west. In his agricultural survey of this county, Mr Pitt states that "one half of the strong clay loam—the whole of which he estimates at 160,000 acres—is in occasional tillage; the whole of the more friable loam—which he also reckons at 160,000 acres—is under occasional tillage. According to this estimate, there are 240,000 acres in occasional tillage, or under the convertible husbandry. Of these he reckons 250,000 acres under wheat; 40,000 under barley; 30,000 under oats; 15,000 under beans, peas, and vetches; 40,000 under turnips, cabbages, &c.; 85,000 under clover; and 5000 fallow." It would appear that at present the cultivation of barley is superseding that of wheat. The average produce of wheat is 28 bushels an acre; of barley, about 4½ quarters. The soil is remarkably favourable to the growth of beans, which were formerly raised in much greater abundance than now, and gave name to the village of Barton-in-the-Beans. On the banks of the rivers are numerous meadows of excellent quality. In particular, the banks of the Soare are very rich. There are many old pastures, chiefly containing grasses, even white clover being rare. The grazing lands have been very generally drained, and in some places considerable attention has been paid to irrigation. There are many dairy farms in this county, especially in the vicinity of Hinckley, Bosworth, and Melton-Mowbray. "The excellent cheese known by the name of Stilton, is made chiefly on the farms near Melton-Mowbray. The quantity of cheese generally sent to Leicester October fair is about 200 tons annually; and it is calculated that of 5000 tons annually sent down the Trent from Leicester, Nottingham, Derby, and the north of Staffordshire, Leicester produces at least 1500 tons, which, it is calculated, will require 7500 dairy cows." The cattle of Leicester owe their excellence to the exertions of Robert Bakewell, Esq. of Dishley farm, near Loughborough, who died in 1795. The results of his exertions are thus described: "The present improved breed of cattle is firm bound, firm in the neck, throat, and bosom; the back is straight, wide, and loaded with flesh; the rump thick, wide, and fleshy on the points, inasmuch that, in some individuals, hillocks of fat are found thereon, and about the root of the tail. The colour is red, the legs short, with thin, wide, and spreading horns. The weight, when fat, is from nine to ten score the quarter, but often much more." Besides this breed many others are met with, as this county is much used for grazing and fattening for the butcher, cattle from Wales, Ireland, Scotland, and the northern counties. This county contains three breeds of sheep: the old Leicester, the new Leicester, and the Forest sheep. The old Leicester seems to be derived from the original stock of the county, and large bound and heavy, with coarse wool, and slow to fatten. The new Leicester breed, for which the county is indebted to Mr Bakewell, is thus described: "Their offals are small and their profitable points large; their backs are broad and straight; their breasts are full, bellies tucked up, heads small, necks short, legs thin, pelts light, and wool fine of its kind; they are quiet in temper and disposition, and capable of being fattened in a short time, on a small proportion of food, and to a great weight, in proportion to their apparent size. Mr Bakewell has fattened mutton to six inches thick upon the ribs. Fat wethers weigh about 25 lb. a quarter; the average fleece is about 7 lb." The forest breed is comparatively inferior, and are found chiefly about Charnwood. The horses of Leicestershire have received considerable improvements from Mr Bakewell. The black breed is in general demand, and many are reared for the waggon, the plough, the race-course, and the chase. This is a celebrated hunting county, for which Melton-Mowbray is the grand rendezvous. Mules and asses are much used by farmers. Swine are extensively fed, and are of a superior breed.

Manufactures.—In 1811, the number of families returned as employed in trade and manufactures, was 17,027. The principal manufactures are connected with the wool, which is one of the staple products of the county. Wool-combing, the spinning of woollen yarn, and the weaving of stockings, are the principal occupations. Hats and machine lace are made to some extent. Raw wool is exported, as well as cheese and cattle.

Antiquities.—We have already referred to the Roman stations in this county. Some remains of buildings belonging to that people are to be seen at Leicester, Rothley, Wanlip, Harborough, Burrough, and Calthorpe. There are few remains of monastic buildings, though there formerly existed 31 of these, of various degrees. There are also few remains of the numerous castles which formerly stood here. There are many elegant seats in this county, among which are Belvoir castle and Donnington-park. There are medicinal springs at Ashby-de-la-Zouch, Burton-Lazars, Dalby-on-the-Wolds, Gumley, Neville-Holt, Leicester, and Sapcote.

LEICESTER,

The county-town of Leicestershire, a borough, and market-town, having separate jurisdiction, but locally situated in the hundred of West Goscote. It contains the liberties of Abbey-Gate, Castle-View, Newark, Black and White Friars, and the chapelries of Knightlow and Bishop's-lee.

History and Antiquities.—This appears to have been the site of a Roman station, mentioned by Antonine as the station Rata, and by Richard of Cirencester as Ratisconion. It had previously flourished from the most remote antiquity, and at the time of the Roman invasion was the chief town of the Coritani. A fabulous tradition refers its foundation to King Lear, but the name of the Soare having formerly been Lear, or Leire, accounts for the origin of such a notion. The present name is a corruption of the Saxon Leirceastre, the town on the Lear. There are several vestiges of the Romans, which may still be seen. Near the church of St Nicholas is a fragment of a Roman building, which has been conjectured to be a temple, from the number of bones of oxen dug up in the vicinity. Many curious tessellated pavements, mosaics, coins, and articles of pottery-ware, have been found here. The fosse-road also passes here, and a Roman milestone was found on it in 1771. This was part of the kingdom of Mercia, and in 737 a bishop was removed hither from Sidnacester. From the reign of Athelstan down to Henry II., a mint was kept here, where coins were struck. In 874, the town came into the possession of the Danes, and was retained by them till they were driven from it by Ethelfreda, daughter of Alfred. The castle was destroyed at this time, but was repaired by Hugo de Graintemaisnel, on whose opposition to William Rufus, it was again razed to the ground. Again it rose from its ruins in the reign of Henry I., when Robert de Mellent was created earl of Leicester, but his sons' rebellion against Henry II. caused the demolition of the castle once more. Under Henry III. it was restored by Edmund, earl of Lancaster, on whom the forfeited earldom of Leicester was conferred. Henry V. held a parliament here in 1414, and the dukes of Bedford and Gloucester held another in 1423, in the name of Henry VI., then a minor. The castle suffered much during the struggles of the houses of York and Lancaster, so much so as to be unable to afford a night's shelter to Richard III. a few days before the battle of Bosworth. The town suffered much, and the castle was finally dismantled, in the parliamentary war, and of the latter only a few detached portions remain.—Of the monastic antiquities the following account is given by Bishop Tanner: "Here was before the conquest a collegiate church of prebends intra castrum, which was, during the wars in the time of King William I., destroyed together with the city and castle, but was rebuilt, A. D. 1107, by Robert, earl of Mellent and Leicester, for a dean and 12 prebendaries, and dedicated, as the old church was, to St Mary. The greatest part of the lands and tithes belonging to this college was, by Robert Bossu, earl of Leicester, alienated and annexed to his new abbey of St Mary de Pratis. However, here continued a master and seven fellows, or rather a dean and seven prebendaries, whose house was called the college of St Mary the Less, and whose revenues were valued, 26th Henry VIII., at £23 12s. 11d. clear.—On four acres of ground near the castle, Henry, earl of Leicester and Lancaster, A. D. 1330, began to build an hospital to the honour of the annunciation of the Virgin Mary, for a master, and certain chaplains and poor persons, which was so much augmented by his son Henry, duke of Lancaster, that about the year 1385 it was turned into a noble college, called the Newark, or Collegium Novi Operis, or St Mary's the Greater; and it was finished or further improved, both in buildings and endowments, by the celebrated John of Gaunt, duke of Lancaster, and his executors. The whole foundation consisted of a dean, 12 secular canons, or prebendaries, 12 vicars, 3 clerks, 6 choristers, 50 poor men and 50 poor women, 10 nurses, with proper officers and attendants, all plentifully provided for, and the house was much favoured by King Henry IV. and his successors of the Lancasterian line. The sum total of its possessions, 26th Henry VIII., was £688 7s. 2d., according to Sancroft's MS. valuation, and the clear sum £595 7s. 4d., according to Sir Wm. Dugdale. Some part of it was granted, 2d Edward VI., to John Beaumont and William Guyse. The corporation of Leicester having purchased some of the lands which belonged to the dissolved colleges and hospitals in this place, built the town gaol upon part of it, and on the other part founded an hospital for poor widows. A new beds-house or hospital for a master, confrater, and twenty-four poor people, viz., 12 men and 12 women, was founded here by Wm. Wigston, merchant of the staple, in the latter part of King Henry VI., or thereabouts. It was dedicated to St Ursula, and the possessions of it were valued, 26th Henry VIII., at no more than £8 per annum. But having the good fortune to escape the general dissolution of hospitals in the time of Edward VI., there are now 24 poor people in it who have each 2s. 10d. per week. The confrater hath about £70 per annum, and the master about £160. The master and confrater are put in by the chancellor of the duchy of Lancaster, and the poor people by the master. Here were also an hospital dedicated to St Leonard, and four religious houses of the following orders:—Austin friars, Black friars, Grey friars, and friars de Penitencia."

General Description.—The town is situated on the Soare, which is here crossed by three ancient and one modern bridge. The streets are spacious, well paved, lighted with gas, and watched. The inhabitants have abundant supply of water from wells, several of which are public, and from a public conduit in the market-place. Close to the south-eastern side of the town is a fine promenade called the New walk, from which there are delightful views. Races are held in September, and there is a triennial music meeting. Here are also a good theatre and assembly rooms, the former of which is open in September. An agricultural society has been established here. The population, in 1801, was 17,005; in 1811, 23,146; in 1820, 30,125; and in 1831, 39,306.

Trade, &c.—Saturday is market day, and fairs for horses, cattle, sheep and cheese, are held March 2d, Saturday before Easter, Saturday in Easter week, May 12th, 13th, 14th; June 1st, July 5th, October 10th, 11th, 12th, and December 8th. To these the following have recently been added, Jan. 4th, June 1st, Sep. 12th, Nov. 2d. The inhabitants of this town are chiefly employed in the various branches of manufactures connected with wool. In 1811, 4,090, and in 1821, 5,723 families were returned as employed in trade and manufactures. The manufacture of stockings is the most flourishing branch. In the year 1680, there was but one stocking-maker in Leicester; now there are upwards of 100, and the persons employed in the knitting and subordinate operations are about 12,000. When trade is good, upwards of 20,000 dozen pairs of stockings are here made weekly. The number of frames in 1815 was 4,000; it is now about 7,800. By means of the river Soare, Leicester communicates more or less directly with the great lines of inland navigation, and it derives considerable advantage from this, as well as from its situation on the great northern road. A railway is about to be carried from Leicester to Swannington, which will render the supply of coal more abundant.

Municipal Government.—The town of Leicester was first incorporated by King John. It is now governed under a charter granted by Elizabeth in 1584, and confirmed by James I. in 1604, by a mayor, recorder, high-steward, bailiff, 24 aldermen, 48 common council-men, with a town-clerk and other officers. The mayor, recorder, and four aldermen, are sole justices of the peace within the borough, and possess concurrent jurisdiction with the county magistrates within the liberties. The corporation hold courts of quarter session for offences not capital; also a court of record for debts to any amount. The freedom of the city is obtained by birth, servitude, purchase, or gift; and confers the privilege of exemption from toll in all fairs in England, and the right of pasturage for a certain number of cattle in the Abbey-meadows and certain other public grounds. The town first returned two members to parliament in the 23d of Edward I. In the reign of Henry VIII., one member was chosen by the mayor and his brethren, and the other by the inhabitants at large. This mode of election continued till the time of Charles II., from which the elective franchise was vested in the inhabitants at large, paying scot and lot, amounting to above 4,700. The number of voters under the new franchise is about 1,900. The members for the county are likewise elected here. Here are also the county, town, and borough jails, which are well adapted for the purpose to which they are applied. The great hall of the castle yet remains, and has been fitted up for holding the assizes. It is so extensive, that several courts are held in it, without one disturbing the other. Here are an exchange, excise-office, and guild-hall.

Parishes, &c.—The following parishes are contained in Leicester:—All Saints is a discharged vicarage, with St Clement's, St Michael's, and St Peter's, rated at £4 8s. 5d., and in the patronage of the lord-chancellor. The church is in the early style of English architecture, and consists partly of an ancient and partly of a modern structure, and contains some curious carving in wood, and an ancient font.—The living of St Clement's is a vicarage not in charge. The church is in ruins, and the living has been annexed to that of All Saints.—St George's is a curacy, a donative in the patronage of the vicar of St Margaret, to whose parish it is a chapel-of-ease. The church was erected in 1816, at an expense of £14,964 4s. 8d., granted by the parliamentary commissioners.—The living of St Leonard's is a discharged vicarage, rated at £6, and annexed to the living of St Margaret's or All Saints. The church was destroyed in the parliamentary war.—The living of St Margaret's is a discharged vicarage, rated at £17 8s. 6½d., a peculiar of Lincoln, and in the patronage of the prebendary of St Margaret's in the cathedral of Lincoln. The prebend of St Margaret's is rated at £27 6s. 3d., and in the patronage of the bishop of Lincoln. The church of St Margaret's is a beautiful specimen of English architecture in a mixed style, and was formerly a cathedral, according to Leland. It was erected in 1444, and consists of a nave, aisles, and chancel, containing some interesting mona-ments, and richly carved wooden stalls and seats.—The living of St Martin's is a discharged vicarage, rated at £6 13s. 4d., and in the patronage of the lord-chancellor. The church, which is a cruciform structure presenting a mixture of English and Norman architecture, is said to have been originally dedicated to the Holy Cross. In the chancel are three stone stalls; the organ, which is a fine one, was built by Snetzler, and the altar-piece by Francisco Vanni, represents the ascension. During the parliamentary war this church suffered very much, having been used as barracks by the parliamentary troops, who defaced the ornaments. This is regarded as the principal church in Leicester. The chancel is used by the bishop of Lincoln for confirmation. The archdeacon of Leicester holds his court here, and the judges of assize attend divine service here. The archdeaconry of Leicester is rated at £87 19s. 2d., and in the patronage of the bishop of Lincoln.—The living of St Mary is a discharged vicarage, rated at £8, and in the patronage of the lord-chancellor. The church is a spacious, but irregular structure, at the west end of which is a tower and spire, erected in 1783, after the model of the ancient one, which had been destroyed by lightning. The general style of the architecture is early English, with a mixture of Norman. In the chancel are six curiously ornamented stalls. The font is curious and ancient, and the roof is of elaborately carved oak.—The living of St Nicholas is a discharged vicarage, rated at £3 11s. 3d., returned at £98, and in the patronage of the king. The church, which is said to have been constructed out of the materials of an ancient Roman temple, is chiefly in the Norman style. This church is about to be rebuilt.—The living of St Peter's is a vicarage, rated at £2 5s., in the patronage of the king, and annexed to the living of All Saints. The church is demolished.—The Baptists have 7 chapels here; the Independents 3; the Primitive Methodists 2; the Wesleyan Methodists, Roman Catholics, Unitarians, and Society of Friends, each one.

Schools, &c.—Here are several well endowed schools. The free grammar school, open to all sons of burgesses, for instruction in the classics, writing, and arithmetic, is of ancient foundation. Annexed to it are several exhibitions to the universities, the funds of which have been allowed to accumulate with the view of founding new exhibitions with better endowments. The green-coat school is well endowed. Here are instructed 80 scholars, who are entitled, after 3 years, to an apprentice fee of £5. In St Mary's school, 80 boys and 40 girls are clothed and instructed. In St Martin's, 150 boys and 84 girls are instructed, and partly clothed. In St Margaret's, 73 boys and 41 girls receive instruction and clothing. In 1824, a national school was founded, in which from 400 to 500 children are taught. Some of the hospitals have already been mentioned. In addition to these are,—that of St John the Baptist, for six poor widows, among whom the sum of £17 is annually divided; Burt's hospital for four aged women, each of whom receives 4s. weekly; and Simson's, in which are six aged widows, to each of whom are given £3, and 5 cwt. of coal per annum. There are also five almshouses, founded and endowed with £60 per annum, in 1792, by John Johnson, Esq., to which needy relatives of the founder have a preference. A female asylum was erected in 1800, in which 16 orphan girls are educated for service. Here are also an infirmary and lunatic asylum; the former capable of accommodating 84 patients. Besides these there are other benefactions for the benefit of the poor, at the disposal of the corporation. Distance from London, 96 m. N.N.W.

LEICESTER-ABBEY, an extra-parochial lordship in the hundred of West Goscote, co. of Leicester. "An abbey of Black canons was founded here by Robert Bossu, earl of Leicester, in honour of the assumption of the Blessed Virgin Mary, A.D. 1143. It was endowed with £1062 4s., and the site was granted 4th, Edward VI., to William, marquess of Northampton."—Tanner's Not. Mon. Some parts of the buildings yet remain. Distance from Leicester, 1 m. N. Pop., in 1831, 18.

LEICESTER-FOREST, an extra-parochial liberty in the hundred of Sparkenhoe, co. of Leicester. Adjacent to Leicester. Pop., in 1831, 67. A. P., £2,939.

LEIGH, a tything in the parish of Wimborne-Minster, co. of Dorset. Here was once a chapel. Pop., in 1831, 532.

LEIGH, a chapelry in the parish of Tetminster, co. of Dorset. Living a curacy, a peculiar of the dean of Salisbury. Distance from Sherborne, 6½ m. S. by W. Pop., in 1801, 300; in 1831, 400. A. P., £2,803.

LEIGH, a parish and seaport in the hundred of Rochford, co. of Essex. Living, a rectory in the archd. of Essex and dio. of London, rated at £15, and in the patronage of the bishop of London. The church, which is ded. to St Clement, stands on a commanding eminence. The inhabitants are chiefly fishermen. The Wesleyan Methodists have a place of worship here. The parish includes the island of Leigh-Marsh and part of Canvey island, with the oyster-creek there. Here is a custom-house. Distance from Rochford, 2½ m. S.W. Pop., in 1801, 570; in 1831, 1254. A. P., £2,152.

LEIGH, a parish in the hundred of Deerhurst, co. of Gloucester. It comprises also the hamlet of Evington in the hundred of Westminster. Living, a discharged vicarage in the dio. of Gloucester, in the jurisdiction of the peculiar court of Deerhurst, rated at £7 16s. 3d., and in the patronage of the lord-chancellor. Church ded. to St James. The Combe-hill canal and the river Severn pass through the parish. Distance from Gloucester, 6 m. N.N.E. Pop., in 1801, 303; in 1831, 355. A. P., £2,897.

LEIGH, or WEST LEIGH, a parish in the hundred of Somerden, lathe of Sutton-at-Hone, co. of Kent. Living, a vicarage in the archd. and dio. of Rochester, rated at £9 18s. 9d., and, in 1811, in the patronage of N. May, Esq. The church, in which was anciently a chantry, is ded. to St Mary. It contains some ancient monuments and richly stained glass. The Medway bounds the southern part of the parish. A fair is held 25th July. Distance from Tunbridge, $3\frac{1}{2}$ m. W. Pop., in 1801, 739; in 1831, 1011. A. P., £4,696.

LEIGH, a hamlet in the parish of Wins-ham, co. of Somerset.

LEIGH, a tything in the parish of Pit-minster, co. of Somerset. Here is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists.

LEIGH, a tything in the parish of Hum-bledon, co. of Southampton.

LEIGH, a tything in the parish of Havant, co. of Southampton.

LEIGH, or LEIGH (WEST), a parish in the hundred of West Derby, co.-palatine of Lanc-aster. It includes the chapelrys of Astley and Atherton, and the townships of Bedford, Tyl-desley, Pennington, and West Leigh; the market-town of Leigh being composed of the last two. The market-town of Leigh is situ-ated on the Leeds and Liverpool canal, where it is joined by a branch from that of the duke of Bridgewater. The inhabitants are chiefly employed in various branches of the cotton manufacture, as muslins, calicoes, fustians, cam-brics, &c., and the commercial establishments appear to be flourishing. Coal and a peculiar kind of lime are abundant in the vicinity, and trade is greatly benefited by the free communi-cation by water with Liverpool and Manches-ter. The market-place stands in the township of West Leigh. Saturday is market-day; and fairs for cattle, pigs, horses, and pedlery, are held April 24th and 25th, and December 7th and 8th. The petty-sessions for the division are held here, also courts for the manors of Pennington and West Leigh. This was the residence of Thomas Highs, the inventor of the spinning-jenny and water-frame. Living, a discharged vicarage in the archd. and dio. of Chester, rated at £9, and, in 1829, in the pa-tronage of Lord Lilford. The church is an ancient stone building, ded. to St Mary. The Independents, Wesleyan Methodists, Sweden-burgians, and Roman Catholics, have places of worship here. Here are numerous Sunday schools. The free grammar school is of re-mote foundation, and has an income of £25, for which seven scholars are educated; the master has a free house. Distance from Lon-don, 197 m. N.W. Pop. of the parish, in 1831, 20,063. The other returns will be found under the different townships and cha-pleries.

LEIGH, or LEESE, a parish in the hundred of Tettonalow, co. of Stafford. Living, a rectory in the archd. of Stafford and dio. of Lichfield and Coventry, rated at £14 0s. 5d., and, in 1829, in the patronage of Lord Bagot. The church is an ancient building, ded. to All Saints. Here is a school in which 55 children receive education, on an endowment of £66 per annum. "At a place of this name," says Tamer, "either in this county or in Derby-shire, seems to have been a house of Austin canons, dedicated to St Michael, and cell to the abbey of Roucester, to which Fulcher fil. Fulcher, in the time of Henry II., gave the church of St Peter at Edneshouse, or Edyn-sar, in the co. of Derby." Distance from Ut-toxeter, $4\frac{1}{2}$ m. W.N.W. Pop., in 1801, 842; in 1831, 1038. A. P., £7,364.

LEIGH, a parish in the hundred of Rei-gate, co. of Surrey. Living, a rectory in the archd. of Surrey and dio. of Winchester, rated at £15 10s. 5d., returned at £72, and, in 1829, in the patronage of R. C. Dendy, Esq. Church ded. to St Bartholomew. Distance from Rei-gate, $3\frac{1}{2}$ m. S.W. Pop., in 1801, 390; in 1831, 483. A. P., £2,820.

LEIGH, a township in the parish and hun-dred of Westbury, co. of Wilts, containing, in 1831, 1420 inhabitants.

LEIGH, or THE LEA, a chapelry in the parish of Ashton-Keynes, co. of Wilts. Liv-ing, a curacy, not in charge. Distance from Cricklade, 3 m. W. by S. Pop., in 1801, 174; in 1831, 267. A. P., £2,667.

LEIGH, a parish in the hundred of Per-shore, co. of Worcester. Living, a rectory in the archd. and dio. of Worcester, rated at £13 9s. 4d., and, in 1829, in the patronage of Earl Somers. The church, which is ded. to St Edburgh, has a curious ceiling, represent-ing the moon and stars. The noble family of Devereux formerly possessed the manor, and there are some curious old monuments to their memory in the church. In the vicinity flows the river Teme, through very beautiful scenery. Distance from Worcester, $4\frac{1}{2}$ m. W. by S. Pop., in 1801, 1255; in 1831, 1933. A. P., £9,068.

LEIGH (ASBOT'S), a parish in the hun-dred of Portbury, co. of Somerset. Living, a curacy, not in charge, annexed to the vicarage of Bedminster, in the archd. and dio. of Wor-cester. The church is ded. to the Holy Trini-ty, and in the churchyard are the remains of an ancient stone cross. The prefix to the name is derived from the circumstance of the manor having formerly been the property of the abbot of St Augustine in Bristol. The manor-house gave shelter to Charles II. after the battle of Worcester. On the same site has been erected Leigh-house, the seat of John Miles, Esq. This is an elegant structure, commanding beautiful views, and containing a superb col-lection of paintings, of which John Young, keeper of the British museum, published a catalogue, with etchings. Pop., in 1801, 292; in 1831, 360. A. P., £4,170.

LEIGH (HIGH), a chapelry in the parish of Roathern, hundred of Bucklow, co.-palatine of Chester. Living, a curacy, not in charge, endowed with £1,000 private benefaction and £3,300 parliamentary grant, and, in 1829, in the patronage of Egerton Leigh, Esq. Dis-tance from Knutsford, 5 m. N.W. Pop., in 1801, 787; in 1831, 983. A. P., £6,956.

LEIGH (LITTLE), a chapelry in the pa-rish of Great Budworth, hundred of Bucklow, co.-palatine of Chester. Living, a perpetual curacy in the archd. and dio. of Chester, not in charge, returned at £65 10s., and annexed to the vicarage of Great Badworth. The chapel is an ancient structure. Here is a place of worship belonging to the Baptists. The school has a small endowment. The Grand Trunk canal passes in the vicinity of the village. Distance from Northwich, $3\frac{1}{2}$ m. N.W. by W. Pop., in 1801, 380; in 1831, 381. A. P., £2,167.

LEIGH-MILITIS. See ANGERSLEIGH.

LEIGHTON, a hamlet in the parish of Cleford, co. of Somerset.

LEIGHTON-BUZZARD, a parish in the hundred of Manshead, co. of Bedford. It contains the chapels of Billington, Eggington, Heath with Reach, and Stanbridge, and the market-town of Leighton-Buzzard. The adjunct to the name is generally thought to be a corruption of Beau-desert, though some have derived it from Bozard, the name of an ancient family, one of whom was knight of the shire in the reign of Edward III. Some have conjectured, though apparently without solid grounds, that this is the place called Lygeanburgh, mentioned in the Saxon chronicle as having been taken in 571, by Cuthwulf, brother of the Saxon king of Wessex. The town, which consists of a single street, stands on the north-western border of the county, and on the eastern bank of the river Ouse. The female inhabitants are chiefly employed in the manufacture of lace and straw-plait. The operations of lime-burning and brick-making constitute the chief branches of industry; and from the vicinity of the Grand junction canal, there is a considerable trade in corn, timber, iron, &c. Corn enters toll-free to the market, which is held on Tuesday, for the sale of cattle, provisions, and the manufactures of the place. Fairs for horses and cattle are held on February 5th, 2d Tuesday in April, Whit-Tuesday, July 26th, October 24th, and November 7th. The manor belongs to the dean and canons of Windsor, whose lessee holds courts leet and baron twice a-year. In the market-house is a room for the accommodation of the county-magistrates, who have jurisdiction here, and meet every Tuesday. It is one of the polling-places for the county members.

Living, a vicarage in the peculiar jurisdiction and patronage of the prebendary of Leighton-Buzzard, in the cathedral of Lincoln, rated at £15. The church, which was formerly collegiate, is a spacious cruciform structure, ded. to All Saints. The prevailing style of the architecture is the early English, and a massive tower with an octagonal spire, springs from the intersection. In the interior are some ancient monuments and a curious screen. The prebend of Leighton-Buzzard in Lincoln cathedral is rated at £6 16s. 0½d., and in the patronage of the bishop of Lincoln. The Baptists, Wesleyan Methodists, and Society of Friends, have places of worship here. Here is a Sunday school, supported by voluntary contribution; the school-house was erected in 1790 by the Hon. Mrs Leigh, in lieu of the payment of a rent-charge of £10, bequeathed in 1704 by the Hon. Charles Leigh. Here are eight almshouses for poor women, founded in 1630 by Edward Wilkes, and further endowed in 1692 by Matthew Wilkes. The annual income is now £200, from which each of the women receives 4s. weekly, with allowance for coal and clothing; the surplus of the income is applied to various charitable purposes. Here were anciently a cell to the Cistercian abbey of Woburn, and an alien priory, subordinate to Fontevrault in Normandy. In the market-place is an extremely ancient stone cross of pentagonal form, in the perpendicular English style. Near the top are five niches, containing statues of a bishop, St John, the Virgin and child, and others much mutilated. The height is 38 feet. It is supposed to have been erected by the monks. Distance from London, 41 m. N.W. Total pop., in 1831, 5149. That of the town, in 1801, 1963; in 1831, 3330. A. P., £4,102.

LEIGHTONSTONE, a hundred in the co. of Huntingdon, containing 30 parishes, and, in 1831, 9526 inhabitants.

LEINTHAL. See LENTHAL.

LEINTWARDINE, a parish in the hundred of Wigmore, co. of Hereford. It comprises the townships of Adforton, Brakes, Grange, Heath with Jay, Kinton, Leintwardine, Letton, Marlow, Newton, Payton, Walford, and Whittion with Trippleton. The town is near the confluence of the rivers Teme and Clun, which are much resorted to by anglers, and abound in graylings. Limestone is found here. A fair is held 4th April. Living, a discharged vicarage in the archd. of Salop and dio. of Hereford, rated at £7 15s. 8d., and, in 1829, in the patronage of the earl of Oxford. The church is ded. to St Mary, and presents in the windows some beautiful remains of ancient stained glass. The free school, founded in the reign of Queen Anne, by the Right Hon. Robert Harley, has an income of £45 per annum. This parish contained the ancient forest of Mocktree, now disafforested. Distance from Ludlow, 9 m. W. by S. Pop. of the parish, in 1831, 1358. A. P., £1,591. Pop. of the township, in 1801, 671; in 1831, 445.

LEIPSCOT, a township in the parish of Morpeth, co. of Northumberland.

LEIRE, a parish in the hundred of Guthlaxton, co. of Leicester. Living, a rectory in the archd. of Leicester and dio. of Lincoln, rated at £9 14s. 9½d., and, in 1829, in the patronage of the Countess de Grey. Church ded. to St Peter. This parish forms part of the honour of Tutbury, in the duchy of Lancaster, and is subject to the jurisdiction of the court of pleas held at Tutbury. The parochial school-room is a handsome structure, capable of accommodating 70 children, erected lately by subscription. Distance from Lutterworth, 4 m.

N.N.W. Pop., in 1801, 347; in 1831, 485. A. P., £1,890.

LEISTON, a parish in the hundred of Blything, co. of Suffolk. Living, a perpetual curacy, with that of Sizewell, in the archd. of Suffolk and dio. of Norwich, not in charge, and in the alternate patronage of Christ's hospital and the company of Haberdashers, London. "Here was an abbey of Premonstratensian canons, built and endowed by the founder of Butley priory, Ranulph de Glanville, A.D. 1182, to the honour of the Virgin Mary. Herein were 14 or 15 religious, who, at the suppression, had yearly revenues worth £181 17s. 1d. clear. The site, with the greatest part of the manors, rectories, and lands belonging to this monastery, were granted, 23th Henry VIII., to Charles, duke of Suffolk, in whose family the patronage or foundership of this house had been for several generations. The first habitation of the abbot and canons being near the sea and inconvenient, Robert de Ufford, earl of Suffolk, about A.D. 1363, built a new abbey at about a mile's distance, upon a better situation, which was unfortunately all consumed by fire before A.D. 1389, but being rebuilt, continued in a flourishing condition till the general dissolution, when here were 15 monks. The old abbey also continued till that time, and had some religious in it."—Tanner's Not. Mon. A great part of the church, with the subterraneous chambers and offices, yet remain, though in a ruinous condition. Some parts have been repaired and are used as barns. Distance from Saxmundham, 4 m. E. by S. Pop., with Sizewell, in 1801, 823; in 1831, 1070. A. P., £3,069.

LEITH-HILL, an eminence in the parish of Wootton, co. of Surrey, near Boxhill. It commands a prospect of the wealds of Surrey and Sussex, as far as the South Downs and the sea, rising above the level of the latter to the height of 993 feet.

LENCH (CHURCH), a parish in the hundreds of Blackenhurst and Halfshire, co. of Worcester. Living, a rectory in the archd. and dio. of Worcester, rated at £9 11s. 10½d., and in the patronage of the lord-chancellor. The Baptists have a place of worship here. The parish contains the hamlets of Atch, or East Lench, and Sheriff's-Lench. Distance from Evesham, 6 m. N. by W. Pop., in 1801, 150; in 1831, 399. A. P., £666.

LENCH (ROUSE), a parish in the hundred of Oswaldslow, co. of Worcester. Living, a rectory in the archd. and dio. of Worcester, rated at £9 0s. 5d., and, in 1829, in the patronage of Sir J. D. Broughton, Bart. Church ded. to St Peter. Distance from Alcester, 7 m. S.W. by W. Pop., in 1801, 231; in 1831, 251. A. P., £1,665.

LENCH (SHERIFF'S), a hamlet in the parish of Church-Lench, co. of Worcester.

LENCH-WICK, a chapelry in the parish of Norton, hundred of Blackenhurst, co. of Worcester. Living, a curacy, not in charge, but the chapel has been demolished. Distance from Evesham, 3 m. N. Pop. returned with the parish.

LEN (THE), a river in Kent, falling into the Medway at Maidstone.

LENGWAR, a hamlet within the liberty of Shrewsbury, co. of Salop.

LENHAM, a parish in the hundred of Eythorne, lathes of Aylesford, co. of Kent. Living, a vicarage in the archd. and dio. of Canterbury, rated at £13 5s. 2½d., and, in 1829, in the patronage of T. F. Best, Esq. The church, which is ded. to St Mary, consists of a nave, chancel, and north aisle, with a small chapel and a square tower. The interior is spacious, and the chancel contains a stone seat, probably an ancient confessional, and 16 stalls, which are supposed to have been intended for the abbot and monks of St Augustine, Canterbury, who had an estate in the parish. The Independents have a place of worship here. Here is a school in which 10 poor boys receive education, on an endowment of £12 per ann. Here was formerly a market on Tuesday, long since disused. The lord of the manor made an ineffectual attempt to renew it in 1757. Fairs for horses and cattle are held June 6th and October 23d. Distance from Maidstone, 10 m. E. by S. Pop., in 1801, 1434; in 1831, 2197. A. P., £7,410.

LENHAM (EAST), a hamlet in the parish of Charing, co. of Kent.

LENHILL (GREAT and LITTLE), two hamlets, partly in the parish of Broughton, Poggas, and partly in that of Lechlade, counties of Gloucester and Oxford.

LENNY, a headland in the parish of Warren, co. of Pembroke, South Wales, just outside the Bristol channel.

LENTHALL, or LEINTHALL, EARLS, a chapelry in the parish of Aymestrey, hundred of Wigmore, co. of Hereford. Living, a per-perpetual curacy in the archd. and dio. of Hereford, rated at £10 10s., and in the patronage of the vicar of Aymestrey. Chapel ded. to St Andrew. Here is a charity school with a small endowment, and an almshouse. Distance from Ludlow, 7 m. S.W.

LENTHALL, or LEDNTHALL, STAKEE, a parish in the hundred of Wigmore, co. of Hereford. Living, a perpetual curacy, rated at £4, returned at £38 10s., and in the patronage of the bishop of Hereford. Church ded. to St Mary Magdalene. Distance from Ludlow, 6 m. S.W. by W. Pop., in 1801, 136; in 1831, 127. A. P., £1,285.

LENTON, a parish in the wapentake of Brentow, co. of Nottingham. Living, a discharged vicarage in the archd. of Nottingham and dio. of York, rated at £9 2s. 5½d., returned at £100, and in the patronage of the lord-chancellor. Church ded. to the Holy Trinity, and contains some interesting monuments. In the neighbourhood are several coal-works, and in the village are several bleaching-works and manufactories of lace. The Nottingham canal passes here. A court for the recovery of debts not above £50, is held here every Tuesday. It is called the Peverel court, from its having been originally granted to Wm. Peverel, son of William I. Its jurisdiction extends over the counties of Derby, Nottingham, and Stafford, and its officers are a steward and deputy, judge, prothonotary, and capital bailiff. Here is a small prison for debtors. "In the beginning of the reign of King Hen. I., William Peverel built a priory here to the honour of the Holy Trinity, and made it subject to the great foreign abbey of Cluny. It was accounted among the alien priories, and had their fate till the Cluniac monks here got it made denizen, by which means it continued till the general dissolution, when the yearly revenues were valued at £417 19s. 3d., and was granted, 5th Elizabeth, to John Harrington. Here were also a hospital of St Anthony, and a house of Carmelite friars."—Tanner's Not. Mon. On the site of the priory a handsome modern seat has been erected, built in the monastic style, and containing some remains of the ancient structure. Fairs for horned cattle, sheep, and hogs, are held on Wednesday in Whitsun-week, and November 11th. Distance from Nottingham, 1 m. W. by S. Pop., in 1801, 893; in 1831, 3077. A. P., £8,997.

LEOMINSTER, a parish in the hundred of Welphy, co. of Hereford. It contains the market-town and borough of Leominster, the chapelry of Irvington, and the township of Broadward. Leominster, which is situated on the river Lugg, in a beautiful and fertile valley, is of high antiquity. The origin of the name is involved in obscurity, but it is probable that, as Leland suggests, the adjunct minster is derived from the circumstance of an ancient monastery having existed here. In the vicinity was a castle of Merwald, king of West Mercia, who, in 660, founded the monastery. This castle, or another on its site, was in existence in 1055, but does not appear in history later than the reign of William Rufus, when the fortifications were strengthened on account of the frequent incursions of the Welsh. In the reign of the Confessor, the manor was granted to Queen Editha, and under her authority the town was governed by provosts and other officers. On the attempt of the duke of Northumberland to raise the Lady Jane Grey to the throne, the inhabitants of Leominster took a prominent place among the supporters of Mary, in consequence of which she granted them their first charter of incorporation. In the Notitia of Bishop Tanner, we find the following account of the monastic establishment here. "Merwald, king of the western part of Mercia, first built a monastery here to the honour of St Peter, about A.D. 660, which being destroyed in the Danish wars, here was a college of prebendaries, and after an abbey of nuns, who were all dispersed, and their lands possessed by laymen, long before the year 1125, when King Edward I. gave this monastery, with every thing belonging to it, to the stately new abbey which he had founded at Reading in Berkshire. After this it became a cell of Benedictine monks, subordinate thereto, and was, A.D. 1536, endowed with the yearly revenue of £660 16s. 8d., out of which there was paid to Reading, and in other reprises, to the value of £448 4s. 8d. The greatest part of the site of this priory was granted, 1st Mary, to the bailiffs and burgesses of the town."

The town is bounded on the north and east by the Lugg, and crossed by the Pinsley and Kenwater, across the latter of which a neat stone bridge has lately been erected. The streets are paved and lighted, but imperfectly. Here are a theatre and public reading-room, and an agricultural society, and races are held annually in the vicinity. Friday is market-day, and fairs for cattle, wool, horses, hops, butter, &c., are held on February 13th, Tuesday after Midlent Sunday, May 2d, July 10th, September 4th, and November 8th. On the Friday after 11th December, a great market is held. Courts of pie-powder are annexed to the fairs. The town had formerly pretty extensive manufactures of hats and woollen cloths, which have almost entirely disappeared. Even that of gloves is on the decline. Flax-dressing, rope-making, malting, tanning, and nail-making, are the most flourishing branches of industry. The neighbourhood produces excellent wool, hops, and cider. The market-house is a handsome modern structure. Several good inns have been established here in consequence of the situation on the great road from London to South Wales. The first charter, already mentioned, as granted by Queen Mary, has been considerably modified by different sovereigns. Under the charter, as last altered by Geo. I., the town is governed by a bailiff, chief steward, recorder, and 24 capital burgesses, with a chamberlain, town-clerk, two sergeants-at-mace, and other officers. The bailiff, who is clerk of the market and coroner, the late bailiff, recorder, and two aldermen, are justices of the peace. The bailiff holds a court of record every Monday for the borough, for the recovery of debts not exceeding £100. Courts of quarter-session are held in January, April, July, and October. The petty-sessions for the division are held here by the county magistrates, and the lord of the manor holds an annual court-leet. Here is a gaol erected in 1750. The town-hall, or butter-cross, is a curious structure, erected in 1633, on the designs of John Abel. It is constructed of wood and brick, and the front is supported by 12 pillars of oak curiously carved. The beams are painted black, and ornamented with carving in a style common to many old houses in the town.

The town has returned two members to parliament ever since the 23d of Edward I. The scot and lot payers, in number about 760, exercised the elective franchise, and the bailiff was returning officer. Two members continue to be returned under the Reform act, and the number of voters is about 300. It is one of the polling places for the county members.

The living is a discharged vicarage in the archdeaconry and diocese of Hereford, rated at £10 3s. 8d., and in the patronage of the lord-chancellor. The church is an ancient structure, dedicated to St Peter and St Paul, presenting chiefly Norman architecture of different ages, with a considerable mixture of various styles of English architecture. The interior is curious, but unfortunately some ancient monuments, stalls, and other interesting objects were destroyed by fire above a century ago. The organ is fine, and an altar-piece represents the Last Supper, after Rubens. The south aisle alone is used for public worship, and is entirely modern, having been lately erected at an expense of £16,000. The Baptists, Presbyterians, Society of Friends, Moravians, and Unitarians, have places of worship here. Here is a free school, founded by Queen Mary, and endowed with £20 per annum. There is also a national school supported by subscription. In 1735, Mrs E. Clarke founded and endowed four almshouses for poor widows, each of whom receives £5 per annum. The earl of Pomfret takes the title of Baron from this town. Distance from London, 137 m. W.N.W. Pop., in 1801, 3019; in 1831, 5249. A. P., £7,852.

LEOMINSTER, a parish in the hundred of Poling, rape of Arundel, co. of Sussex. It is bounded on the west by the river Arun. Living, a vicarage in the archd. and dio. of Chichester, rated at £9 1s. 3d., and in the patronage of Eton college, on the nomination of the bishop of Chichester. Church ded. to St Mary Magdalene. "Here was an alien priory of Benedictine nuns, cell of the nunnery of Almenesche in Normandy, which was founded by Roger of Montgomery, earl of Arundel, in the time of William the Conqueror. Hence it is probable, that that earl, or one of his sons, gave the church of this place and other lands hereabouts to that foreign monastery, which might give occasion for fixing a convent of these nuns in this place before the year 1178. After the wars with France, Richard, earl of Arundel, 7th Richard II., treated with the abbess of Almenesche concerning the purchase of some lands belonging to this alien priory, but the whole seems to have been settled upon Eton college by Hen. VI. Speed saith it was dedicated to St Mary Magdalene."—Tanner's Not. Mon. Distance from Little Hampton, 1½ m. N.W. Pop., in 1801, 357; in 1831, 715. A. P., £4,409.

LEPPINGTON, a chapelry in the parish of Scrayingham, wapentake of Buckrooe, E. R., co. of York. Living, a curacy not in charge, endowed with an estate, the trustees of which appoint the curate. The abbey of Misen den had formerly a chantry here. Distance from New Malton, 8 m. S. by W. Pop., in 1801, 118; in 1831, 118. A. P., £3,044.

LEPTON, a township in the parish of Kirk-Heaton, wapentake of Agbrigg, W. R., co. of York. The inhabitants are much employed in the woollen trade. Here is an endowment of £10 per annum, for apprenticing poor children, given by Richard Beaumont, Esq., in 1703. Distance from Huddersfield, 4 m. E. by S. Pop., in 1801, 2180; in 1831, 3320. A. P., £4,803.

LESBURY, a parish partly in the ward of Bamfrough, and partly in that of Cockerdale ward, co. of Northumberland. It contains the townships of Alemouth, Bilton, Lesbury with Hawkhill, and Wooden. Living, a discharged vicarage in the archd. of Northumberland and dio. of Durham, rated at £8 2s. 10d., and in the patronage of the lord-chancellor. Church ded. to St Mary. There is a considerable trade in grain with London and other places through the medium of the river Alne, which falls into the German ocean a little below this place. Many of the inhabitants are fishermen. The school has an endowment of £10 10s., given, in 1718, by Mr Henry Strother. A school-room and house for the master were given by the duke of Northumberland. Distance from Alnwick, 4 m. E. by S. Pop., of the parish, in 1831, 976; that of the town, in 1801, 524; in 1831, 473. A. P., £1,018.

LESKEARD. See LISKEARD.

LESNEWTH, a hundred in the north-western coast of the co. of Cornwall, and within the new eastern division of the county. It contains 17 parishes, with the boroughs of Camelford and Bossiney. Pop., in 1831, 8277.

LESNEWITH, a parish in the above hundred. Living, a discharged rectory in the archd. of Cornwall and dio. of Exeter, rated at £8, and, in 1829, in the patronage of Edmund J. Glynn, Esq. Church ded. to St Knet. Distance from Camelford, $4\frac{1}{2}$ m. N. by E. Pop., in 1801, 104; in 1831, 127. A. P., £1,400.

LESSINGHAM, a parish in the hundred of Happing, co. of Norfolk. Living, a discharged rectory, with that of Hempstead, in the archd. of Norfolk and dio. of Norwich, rated at £6, and in the patronage of King's college, Cambridge. Church ded. to All Saints. The school has a small endowment. "This manor being given by Gerard de Gournay, in the time of William Rufus, to the abbey of Bec in Normandy, here became an alien priory, which was subordinate to Okeburn in Wiltshire, the chief of all the houses in England belonging to that foreign monastery. The priory of Lessingham, after the seizing of all these alien lands, during the wars with France, was leased to Sir Thomas Erpingham, and after to Edward Clere, Esq., at the rent of £16 per ann., which King Henry VI gave to Eton college; but King Edward VI gave the priory or manor absolutely to King's college in Cambridge, to which it still belongs."—Tanner's Not. Men. Distance from North Walsham, 7 m. E. by S. Pop., in 1801, 159; in 1831, 191. A. P., £572.

LESSNESS, a hundred in the lathe of Sutton-at-Hone, co. of Kent. It contains 4 parishes; and, in 1821, the population was 5032.

LESSNESS, or WESTWOOD, a chapelry in the parish of Erith, hundred of Lessness, co. of Kent. Living, a curacy, not in charge. "Richard de Lacy, chief-justice of England, A.D. 1178, and who had some years before discharged the trust of regent or governor of the realm during the king's absence in France, began an abbey for Black canons upon his estate here, and the next year quitted all his great places, and took on him the habit of religion, and shortly after died in this house, which was dedicated to St Mary and St Thomas the Martyr; for so it seems Thomas à Becket, late archbishop of Canterbury, was called in about eight years after his death. The spiritualities of this abbey were valued at £75 3s. 4d., and the temporalities at £111 5s. 8d.; which revenues were among others granted, 17th Henry VIII., to Cardinal Wolsey, in order to the better endowment of his colleges, and upon the cardinal's premunire, the site was granted, 25th Henry VIII., to William Brereton, and, after his attainder, to Sir Ralph Sadler, 28th Henry VIII."—Tanner's Not. Men. Distance from Crayford, 2 m. N.N.W. Pop. returned with the parish.

LEVAN (Sr), a parish in the hundred of Penwith, co. of Cornwall. Living, a perpetual curacy, not in charge, a royal peculiar, and annexed to the rectory of St Burian. The parish takes its name from a well and oratory ded. to St Levan an anchorite, who was canonized after his death. Here are some remarkable rocks called Castle-Tryern. These project into the sea, rising in rugged forms to a considerable altitude, and are defended on the land side by ramparts and ditches. On one of the most elevated points is the celebrated Loggan, or rocking stone, a mass of granite, supposed to weigh not less than 90 tons, yet so poised that a slight force is sufficient to cause it to rock to and fro. This is supposed to be a Druidical monument, and is the largest of the kind in the kingdom. It was overturned in 1820 by some mischievous sailors, but has since been replaced. Distance from Penzance, 9 m. S.W. Pop. of the parish, in 1801, 400; in 1831, 515. A. P., £2,063.

That of the township, in 1801, 411; in 1831, 669. A. P., £4,822. Living, a rectory in the archd. and dio. of York, rated at £16 13s. 4d., and, in 1829, in the patronage of Sir William Pennymann, Bart. Church ded. to St Faith. The Independents and Wesleyan Methodists have places of worship here. A canal extends from this place to the river Hull. Distance from Beverley, 7 m. N.E.

LEVENS, a chapelry in the parishes of Heversham and Kendal, co. of Westmoreland. It comprises the township of Levens, and the hamlets of Beathwaite-green, Sizergh-Fell-side, and part of Brigsteer. The chapel is a handsome Gothic structure, with a tower and spire, erected in 1828 at an expense of £2,000, by the Hon. F. G. Howard. This gentleman is patron, and pays the curate £200 per annum. Here is an iron manufactory. Here are two well-endowed schools, founded by members of the Howard family. In the immediate vicinity is the venerable mansion of that family, called Levens-hall. The grounds are very fine, and command extensive prospects. In the park are remains of an ancient building, supposed to have been a Roman temple. The river Kent flows in the vicinity, and forms at one place a fine cascade, called Levens-Force. The township is divided into Upper and Lower Levens. Distance from Kendal, 6 m. S. Pop., in 1801, 442; in 1831, 789. A. P., £4,618.

Living, a perpetual curacy in the archd. and dio. of Chester, not in charge, endowed with £200 private benefaction, £1,300 parliamentary grant, and £800 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the vicar of the parish. Chapel ded. to St Matthew. Here are some coal mines. The Wesleyan Methodists have a place of worship here. Here is a school in which six children receive gratuitous education, for which the master has a free dwelling-house. Here were born, Thomas Lever, an eminent preacher in the reign of Edward VI., and Oliver Heywood, one of the nonconformists. Distance from Great Bolton, 3 m. E.S.E. Pop., in 1801, 1276; in 1831, 231. A. P., £2,611.

LEVERINGTON, a parish in the hundred of Wisbeach, Isle of Ely, co. of Cambridge. Living, a rectory, exempt from visitation, rated at £35 Os. 7½d., and in the peculiar jurisdiction and patronage of the bishop of Ely. Church ded. to St Leonard and St John the Baptist. Here is a school endowed with £20 per annum. "There was," says Tanner, "an old hospital at Leverington, long since decayed, and the endowment swallowed up." It is supposed that the lands which now afford the revenues of the school belonged to this hospital. In 1389, here was a chantry chapel. Distance from Wisbeach, 2 m. N.W. Pop., in 1801, 593; in 1831, 1700. A. P., £7,790.

LEVERSDALE, a township in the parish of Irthlington, co. of Cumberland. Distance from Carlisle, 7 m. N.E. Pop., in 1801, 399; in 1831, 431.

LEWES, a hundred in the rape of Lewes, co. of Sussex; it contains only the parish and borough of Lewes.

LEWES (RAPE OF), a division in the middle of the co. of Sussex, extending from the border of Surrey to the sea at Brighton, bounded on the east by the Ouse.

LEWES, a borough and market-town, comprehending the whole hundred of Lewes, and partly situated in the hundreds of Barcombe, Ringmere, and Swanborough, rapes of Lewes and Pevensey, co. of Sussex. Attempts have been made, but apparently without success, to prove this to have been the site of the Roman station Mantantonis. It seems pretty certain, however, that some station did exist here, as many tumuli, containing urns, coins, and other articles, exist in the vicinity, and the earth-works, or castra, yet remain on the neighbouring hills. The name is supposed to have been derived from the ancient British words Leaw, an area, and lec, water; in allusion to its situation. It is first mentioned in history as a demeane of the crown under the kings of the South Saxons. It subsequently fell successively into the hands of the kings of Wessex, and of the Saxon and Danish kings, and continued a demeane of the crown till after the conquest. In the reign of Athelstan, two mints were established here, and Edward the Confessor established a merchants' guild. At the conquest, the demeane fell into the hands of William I., who bestowed it on his son-in-law, William de Warren, earl of Surrey. Here was a castle, founded by Alfred the Great, which William de Warren repaired or rebuilt, and made his principal residence. The ruins are still visible, but little more than the western keep exists. The earth-works, which are peculiar, may still be traced. The gate-way, which presents a specimen of the Anglo-Norman architecture, is supposed to have been erected by the first and eighth earls of Surrey. In this castle, Henry III. and his brother Richard were confined after the battle of the 14th May, 1264, in which they were conquered by the insurgent barons, under Montfort, earl of Leicester. The name of the 'Mise of Lewes,' has been given to the treaty which was here entered into by the king and barons. On the death of the last earl of Warren and Surrey, the estates devolved to Richard Fitz Alan, earl of Arundel, whose grandson left no heirs male, and consequently they were divided among his sisters, whose descendants still hold them in coparceny.

Antiquities.—The monastic antiquities are thus mentioned by Tanner:—"Earl William de Warrenna and the Lady Gundreda his wife, A.D. 1078, founded in the old church of St Pancrace, under the castle here, a priory, which was the first and chiefest house of the Cluniac order in England. Its yearly revenues at the dissolution were computed by Mr Speed to be worth £1091 9s. 6d. The site was granted 20th Henry VIII. to Thomas Lord Cromwell, and 2d Elizabeth, to Richard Baker and Richard Sackville. Here were also two hospitals, one of which was dedicated to St James, and the other to St Nicholas, and a priory of Grey friars." Of these priories and hospitals, few remains of any importance exist. Of the Cluniac monastery, the gateway, and part of the church-wall remain. Of the hospitals, only part of the walls exist.

Description.—The town is situated on a declivity, having the Ouse on the east, at the distance of about seven miles from the sea. It is surrounded on every side, except the west, by an amphitheatre of low hills, forming part of the South Downs. The river is navigable, and is crossed by a stone-bridge, built a century ago. The suburb, on the eastern side of the river, is called the town of Cliff. The streets are in general spacious, well paved, remarkably clean, and lighted with gas; many of the houses are handsome, and there is a good supply of well-water. The bishop's registrar-office for the archdeaconry of Lewes, and the head office for stamps and legacy duties for the eastern district of the county, are kept here. Here are a book and literary societies, which have good libraries, especially the former, which has been established since 1785. In 1825, a mechanics' institution was founded, which has since continued to flourish, and is now in possession of a commodious suit of apartments, with philosophical apparatus, and above 700 volumes.

Races are held in the vicinity in March and August. A theatre is occasionally opened.

Population, Trade, &c.—The population, in 1801, was 3309; and in 1831, 8592. There is some trade in grain and malt, but that in wool, anciently famous, has declined. Paper is made here, but not to a great extent. On the banks of the Ouse are extensive iron-works, in which cannon and other large articles are manufactured. Ordinary markets are held daily. Every Tuesday is a corn-market, and on each alternate Tuesday is a market for live stock. Fairs for cattle, horses, wool, and especially for sheep, are held on May 6th, Whit-Tuesday, July 26th, September 21st, and October 2d. A market was formerly held at Cliff, but it has fallen into disuse.

Municipal Regulations, &c.—The town is under the jurisdiction of the county magistrates, who hold here the quarter sessions for the rapes of Lewes, Pevensey, and Hastings, and an adjourned annual session for the county. For the internal regulation of the town, two constables and two headboroughs are annually chosen at the court-leet of the lord of the manor, which formerly had jurisdiction over capital offences. The summer and winter assizes for the county are held here. A new assize-hall was erected in 1812, at an expense of £10,000, in addition to which, £5,600 were laid out on the purchase of ground. It is an elegant and commodious structure, designed by Mr John Johnstone, and extends 80 feet in length by 76 in breadth. The house of correction for the eastern district of the county was erected here in 1793, on the plan suggested by Mr Howard. An additional wing was erected in 1817. Here is a sheriff's court for the recovery of debts under 40s., but it possesses no authority to imprison for refusal of payment. Lewes was formerly a borough by prescription. The voters were scot and lot payers, about 780 in number, and two members were returned to parliament. Under the Reform act, two members continue to be returned, and the number of electors is about 632. It is also the place of election for the members for the eastern division of the county.

Living, &c.—Lewes formerly contained within the borough eleven parishes, and as many churches, but the number has been reduced to four. The living of All Saints is a discharged rectory, returned at £95 7s. 10d., and, in 1829, in the patronage of Charles Goring, Esq. This parish contains the former parishes of the Holy Trinity, St Peter the Less, and St Nicholas, which were erected in 1805, when a new church was built of brick, at an expense of £2000.—The living of St Andrews is a rectory, rated at £8 10s. 10d., and in the patronage of the king. The church has been desecrated, and the living was annexed, 37th Henry VIII., to that of St Michael.—The living of St John's, under the castle, is a rectory, to which is annexed that of St Mary Magdalene, rated at £3 11s. 3d., returned at £50, and, in 1829, in the patronage of John Crofts, Esq. The church, though considerably altered by modern repairs, presents many features of the Norman style of architecture. Magnus, son of Harold II., is buried in the church-yard, and an inscription in Anglo-Saxon letters is yet visible on his tomb. Part of this parish extends out of the borough into the hundred of Swanborough.—The parish of St Anne includes those of St Mary Westout, and St Peter Westout. The living of St Mary is a rectory, rated at £7 6s. 10d.; that of St Peter, a discharged rectory, rated at £12 6s. 8d. Both are in the patronage of the king, and were united in the 37th Henry VIII. The church of St Peter has been demolished; that of St Mary, which is the parish church, is a very ancient structure, presenting a combination of the Norman and early English styles of architecture, with a low tower and spire.—The living of St Michael's is a discharged rectory, rated at £8 15s., returned at £55, and in the patronage of the lord-chancellor. To the living is annexed that of St Andrews, and the parish comprises those of St Michael, St Martin, and St Mary in Fore. The church presents some specimens of later English architecture, and contains some interesting monuments. These parishes are all in the archdeaconry of Lewes and diocese of Chichester. Within the borough is the extra-parochial precinct of the castle.

Besides the parishes within the borough, the town of Lewes contains those of St Thomas-in-the-CHIEF, and St John Southover. The living of St Thomas is a discharged rectory, a peculiar of the archbishop of Canterbury, rated at £5 12s. 6d., and in the patronage of the lord-chancellor. The church, which is dedicated to St Thomas à Becket, consists of a nave and aisles, and contains a painting of the Ascension above the altar, and an excellent organ, which formerly stood in the chapel of the duke of Chandos at Cannons.—The living of St John, Southover, is a discharged rectory in the archdeaconry of Lewes and diocese of Chichester, rated at £6 12s., and in the patronage of the lord-chancellor. The church is an old structure, dedicated to St John the Baptist. In the borough there are places of worship belonging to Independents, Wesleyan Methodists, Society of Friends, and Unitarians; in the parish of St Thomas, to the Baptists, Independents, and Huntingdonians; and in Southover, to the general Baptists.

Here is a free grammar school, founded in 1512 by Agnes Morley. The endowment, which originally was £20 per annum, has been augmented by various benefactions. The number of boys on the foundation is now 12, and the master has a free house and garden, with a salary. The Rev. George Steere founded a scholarship in either of the universities for a poor scholar, son of residents in Lewes, to which the constable appoints. The value of this scholarship is about £35 per annum. Here are schools for boys and girls, and infant schools, supported by voluntary subscription.

Southover was formerly called a borough, and belonged to the monastery. On its reverting to the crown at the dissolution, Henry VIII. granted it to Anne of Cleves, who is said to have resided here in a house still standing. Lewes gave birth to Dr Richard Russel, F.R.S., whose writings first caused Brighton to become a place of fashionable resort. In the free school were educated the famous Sir John Evelyn and John Pell, the mathematician. Thomas Paine, author of 'the Rights of Man,' was once an exciseman here. In the borough are several mineral springs, and in the vicinity have been found many curious fossils and organic remains. Among the latter are the Megalosaurus, Plesiosaurus, crocodiles, tortoises, and fishes. Distance from London, 50 m. S. by E.

LEWISHAM, a parish in the hundred of Blackheath, in the of Sutton-at-Hone, co. of Kent. It was formerly called Levesham, a name derived from the Saxon words Lea, a meadow, and ham, a house or dwelling. The village is situated on the Ravensbourne, a small river which flows into the Thames near Deptford. It is neither paved nor lighted, but contains many good houses and villas, many persons of respectability having been induced to settle here, from the salubrity of the air and the pleasant nature of the surrounding country. The supply of water is chiefly obtained from a small rivulet which passes through the village. The parish is crossed by the Surrey canal, and contains extensive beds of marl, and quarries of limestone, the working of which and the making of bricks give employment to many of the inhabitants. A weekly session is held here every Monday by the county magistrates, and the parish is within the jurisdiction of, and sends 12 commissioners to, a court of requests for the recovery of debts under £5, held at Greenwich.

The living is a vicarage in the archdeaconry and diocese of Rochester, rated at £23 19s. 2d., and, in 1829, in the patronage of the earl of Dartmouth. The church, which is dedicated to St Mary, was erected in 1774, but the interior was almost entirely destroyed by fire on Christmas day, 1830, an injury which has since been repaired at the expense of the inhabitants. In different parts of the parish are chapels-of-ease, and the Independents and Wesleyan Methodists have places of worship here. Here are two well-endowed free schools, in which about 62 boys are educated. They were founded in 1656 by the Rev. Abraham Colfe, and the income amounted, in 1818, to £342 15s. 6d. Of this sum, £50 are expended annually in the support of six almshouses. The classical school is intended for boys of the hundred generally, the elementary school is for children of the parish alone; to the former, one son of the incumbents of this and Chislehurst parish has a permanent claim. The masters, in addition to their salaries, have the privilege of taking boarders. Here is a school for girls, the endowment of which yields £20 per annum. "Elthruide, niece to King Alfred, gave this manor to the abbey of St Peter at Ghent in Flanders, many years before the conquest, upon which it became a cell of Benedictine monks to that house. After the suppression of these alien priories, King Henry V. made this part of the endowment of his new erected Carthusian priory at Shene."—Tanner's Not. Mon. The earl of Dartmouth takes the title of viscount from Lewisham. Distance from London, 5 m. S. E. Pop., in 1801, 4007; in 1831, 9659. A. P., £27,007.

LEWKNOR, a hundred in the co. of Oxford, containing nine parishes, and, in 1831, 5006 inhabitants.

LEWKNOR, a parish in the above hundred. The living is a discharged vicarage in the archd. and dio. of Oxford, rated at £11 17s., and, in 1829, in the patronage of All Souls college, Oxford. The church is ded. to St Margaret. A part of this parish extends into the county of Buckingham. Distance from Tetworth, 3½ m. S.S.E. Pop. of the township, in 1801, 335; that of the parish, including the chapelry of Ashamstead, Potcombe, and Uphill, was, in 1831, 709. A. P., £5,641.

LEWSTON, an extra-parochial liberty in the hundred of Sherborne, co. of Dorset. Pop., in 1831, 18.

LEXDEN, a hundred in the co. of Essex, containing 30 parishes, and, in 1831, 21,510 inhabitants.

LEXDEN, a parish in the liberty of the town of Colchester, co. of Essex. It stands on the high road to London, and gives name to the above hundred. The village is supposed to occupy the site of Camalodun, the capital of the Trinobantes. Numerous earth-works and excavations exist in the vicinity. Living, a rectory in the archd. of Colchester and dio. of London, rated at £12, and, in 1829, in the patronage of Mr Papillon. Church ded. to St Leonard. It has recently been repaired, and contains many free sittings. Distance from Colchester, 1½ m. W. Pop., in 1831, 1184. A. P., £4,065.

LEXHAM (EAST), a parish in the hundred of Launditch, co. of Norfolk. Living, a discharged rectory, united in 1742 with that of Litcham, in the archd. and dio. of Norwich, rated at £8 6s., and, in 1829, in the patronage of Lord Wodehouse. Church ded. to St Andrew. Distance from Swaffham, 6 m. N.N.E. Pop., in 1801, 119; in 1831, 306. A. P., £1,350.

LEXHAM (WEST), a parish in the hundred of Launditch, co. of Norfolk. Living, a discharged rectory in the archd. and dio. of Norwich, rated at £5 18s. 8d., and, in 1829, in the patronage of Lord Wodehouse. Church ded. to St Nicholas. Distance from Swaffham, 6 m. N. by E.

LEY, a township in the parish of Aymestrey, co. of Hertford.

LEYBOURNE, a parish in the hundred of Larkfield, lathe of Aylesford, co. of Kent. Living, a rectory in the archd. and dio. of Rochester, rated at £17 13s. 4d., and, in 1829, in the patronage of Sir Henry Hawley, Bart. Church ded. to St Peter and St Paul. Here is a free school for fifty poor children, founded and endowed with £40 per annum, with a school-room and dwelling-house, in 1775, by the Rev. Edward Holme. Here are considerable remains of the castle of Sir Roger de Leybourne, who accompanied Richard I. to Palestine. The gateway is pretty entire, and parts of the moat are visible. Distance from Maidstone, 5 m. N.W. by W. Pop., in 1801, 375; in 1831, 299. A. P., £1,699.

LEYBURN, or LEYBURN LOUNDS, a market-town and township in the parish of Wensley, wapentake of Hang West, N. R., co. of York. It stands in a delightful situation, amid picturesque scenery, and near some rocky hills, on one of which is one of the finest natural terraces in England, called Leyburn Sparol. The town surrounds an oblong space, in the centre of which the markets are held. Friday is market-day; and fairs, chiefly for horned cattle and sheep, are held on the second Fridays in February, May, October, and December. The Roman Catholics, Independents, and Wesleyan Methodists, have places of worship here. Here is a school supported by subscription. In the vicinity are found lead, coal, and lime. Distance from York, 46 m. N.W. by W. Pop., in 1801, 446; in 1831, 1003. A. P., £4,469.

LEYLAND, a hundred in the co.-palatine of Lancaster, containing one market-town, 4 chapelries, and 40 townships. Pop., in 1831, 48,338.

LEYLAND, a parish in the above hundred. It comprises the chapelries of Euxton, Heapey, Hoghton, and Whittle-le-woods, and the townships of Clayton-le-woods, Cuerden, Leyland, Wheelton, and Withnell. Living, a vicarage in the archd. and dio. of Chester, rated at £11, and, in 1829, in the patronage of the Rev. J. Baldwin. The church is a handsome structure, ded. to St Andrew. The roof is arched, and without pillars. The Faringdon family have a chapel and burying vault close to the chancel. The Wesleyan Methodists have a place of worship here. The inhabitants are partly employed in various branches of the cotton manufacture. Here is a free grammar-school, originally founded and endowed by Queen Elizabeth. The augmented endowment now yields about £27 per annum, and 30 children are taught to read. Here is a national school for 110 boys and 70 girls, endowed with £180 per annum. Here are almshouses, with small endowments, for six poor persons. Here is also a savings bank. The petty sessions for the division are held here every fifth Monday. Distance from Chorley, 4 m. N.W. Pop. of the parish, in 1831, 13,871; that of the township, in 1801, 2088; in 1831, 3404. A. P., £10,161.

LEYSDOWN, a parish in the liberty of the tale of Sheppey, lathe of Scray, co. of Kent. Living, a discharged vicarage in the archd. and dio. of Canterbury, rated at £10 10s., and in the patronage of the archbishop of Canterbury. The church is a modern structure, ded. to St Clement. Distance from Queenborough, 8 m. E. by S. Pop., in 1801, 88; in 1831, 191. A. P., £1,555.

LEYTON (Low), a parish in the hundred of Becontree, co. of Essex. It includes the chapel of Leytonstone. This was the site of a Roman station, which Camden, Gale, and other antiquaries suppose to have been the Duraditum, and its present name expresses its situation on the river Ley or Lea. The village stands on the western bank of that river, and consists of a single long street extending along the road from Epping to London. It contains some very good houses, and is lighted with gas. Living, a discharged vicarage in the archd. of Essex and dio. of London, rated at £7 12s., and, in 1829, in the patronage of J. Pardoe, Esq. The church is an old building of brick, ded. to St Mary, and consisting of a nave, chancel, north aisle, and western tower. It contains some interesting monuments, among which is one to the celebrated traveller Mr John Wood. John Styrpe, the ecclesiastical historian and antiquary, was curate and vicar of this parish during 68 years, and lies buried in the church. Here are national schools, schools of industry, and an endowed free school in which twelve boys receive gratuitous instruction. Here are endowed almshouses for eight poor widows. The Independents and Wesleyan Methodists have places of worship here. Many antiquities—chiefly Roman—have been found in this parish. Among these are pavements, foundations of buildings, an arched gateway, urns, and coins of various dates. Here was born Sir Thomas Rowe, ambassador to the great Mogul in the reign of Charles I. Distance from London, 6 m. N.E. by E. Pop., in 1801, 2519; in 1831, 3323. A. P., £16,046.

LEYTONSTONE, a hamlet in the above parish. A chapel-of-ease was erected here by subscription in 1750. Distance from London, 7 m. N.E. The pop. includes nearly half of that of the parish with which it is returned.

LEZANT, a parish in the northern division of the hundred of East, co. of Cornwall. Living, a rectory in the archd. of Cornwall and dio. of Exeter, rated at £32, and in the patronage of the bishop of Exeter. Church ded. to St Breock. There was formerly a chapel at Treccarrel in this parish. Distance from Launceston, 4½ m. S. by E. Pop., in 1801, 610; in 1831, 841. A. P., £3,303.

LEZIATE, a parish in the Lynn division of the hundred of Freebridge, co. of Norfolk. Living, a rectory in the archd. of Norfolk and dio. of Norwich, not in charge. The church is in ruins, and the living has been annexed to that of Ashwyken. Distance from Lynn-Regis, 5 m. E. Pop., in 1801, 107; in 1831, 158. A. P., £1,291.

LIBBERSTON, a township in the parish of Flixey, N. R. of the co. of York. Pop., in 1831, 173.

LICHBOROUGH, a parish in the hundred of Fawsley, co. of Northampton. Living, a rectory in the archd. of Northampton and dio. of Peterborough, rated at £16 9s. 7d., and, in 1829, in the patronage of R. Clarke, Esq. Church ded. to St Martin. Here is a school endowed with £25, free to poor children in general. Distance from Towcester, 6 m. N.W. Pop., in 1801, 302; in 1831, 415. A. P., £2,833.

LICHET, MATRAVERS, or UPPER, a parish in the hundred of Cogdean, Shaston division of the co. of Dorset. Living, a rectory in the archd. of Dorset and dio. of Bristol, rated at £13 3s. 4d., and, in 1829, in the patronage of W. Trenchard, Esq. Distance from Wimborne-Minster, 6½ m. S.W. by W. Pop., in 1801, 416; in 1831, 680. A. P., £2,324.

LICHET, MINSTER, or LOWER, a parish in the hundred of Cogdean, Shaston division of the co. of Dorset. Living, a perpetual curacy not in charge, annexed to the vicarage of Sturminster-Marshall, and a peculiar exempt from visitation. The chapel is in ruins. Distance from Wareham, 5 m. N.E. by N. LICHFIELD, a parish in the hundred and division of Kingclore, co. of Southampton. Living, a rectory in the archd. and dio. of Winchester, rated at £12 19s. 7d., and, in 1829, in the patronage of Sir R. Kingemill, Bart. Distance from Whitchurch, 5 m. N. Pop., in 1801, 55; in 1831, 82. A. P., £850.

LICHFIELD,

A city and county of itself, locally situated in the hundred of Offlow, co. of Stafford. It is situated in a fine valley, on a small stream which flows into the Trent, not far from the site of the Roman station Etocetum. It contains many handsome houses, and the streets are paved, and lighted with oil. Many respectable families live here, and the vicinity abounds in elegant country seats. The name is supposed to be derived from Saxon words signifying the field of the dead. Tradition points it out as the scene of the massacre of 1000 Christians, in the reign of Dioclesian, and a field is yet known by the name of the Christian field. The following history of the see of Lichfield is taken from the work of Bishop Tanner:—"King Oswy is said to have built here, in the year of our Lord 656, or 657, a cathedral church for the bishop of the Mercians. King Offa, by the favour of Pope Adrian, got it made an archiepiscopal see, A.D. 789, and accordingly a pall was sent to Eadulf, then bishop, whose province was to comprehend the kingdoms of Mercia and of the East Angles, being the bishopricks of Hereford, Worcester, Leicester, Sidnacester, Elmham, and Donwich. But in 10 years' time Lichfield lost this honour, and its church and diocese were again subjected to the metropolitan see of Canterbury. Not long after the conquest, the town was so small as not to be thought a decent place for the residence of a bishop, whereupon the see, A.D. 1075, was translated to Chester, and from thence, A.D. 1102, to Coventry; but in a short time the bishops settled here again, and Roger de Clinton about 1140, not only built a new cathedral church to the honour of St Mary and St Chad, but also restored and augmented the chapter. For the Lichfield annals assert that, in 822, Bishop Ethelwald placed here, under the government of a provost, 19 or 20 canons, half of them priests and half deacons, and give us the names of their distinct prebenda. This the Coventry writers are not willing to allow, but say that Bishop Clinton was the first that instituted any college of canons or prebendaries at Lichfield, and that there were before his time belonging to this church only five priests, serving the five chapels dependent thereon. But, however this was, there have been for several hundred years past, and still continue founded in this cathedral, a bishop, dean, precentor, chancellor, treasurer, the four archdeacons of Coventry, Stafford, Salop, and Derby, and 27 prebendaries, besides five priests vicars, seven lay clerks, eight choristers, and other officers and servants." The castle of Lichfield, the origin of which is involved in obscurity, was the prison of Richard II. on his way to the tower of London. During the parliamentary war, Lichfield suffered much from its attachment to the royal cause, and was alternately in the hands of the parliamentary and royalist party.

Municipal Government.—Lichfield was first incorporated by Edward VI., and constituted a county by Elizabeth. The present charter was granted by James I. This charter, dated Nov. 5th, 1664, directs "that two bailiffs shall be annually elected by the brethren on St James' day; that the senior bailiff shall be nominated by the bishop, keep a part of the seal, and be escheator; that the bailiffs, at the expiration of their offices, shall be justices of the peace for the succeeding year, and shall, together with the three bailiffs, hold courts of record weekly for the recovery of debts under 40s., courts of quarter-session, and a weekly petty-session, also, in conjunction with the rest of the corporation, occasional assizes for the city and county of the city, for the trial of capital offenders; shall have the use of fines and dues; that there shall be 21 brethren elected from among the citizens, and so called to aid and assist the bailiffs, as the common council of the city; that the bailiffs, or any of the brethren, shall be liable to be removed by a majority of the body, and upon the death or removal of any, others shall be elected by the like authority." It empowers the bailiffs and brethren to hold courts of gaol delivery, to award judgment of death or other punishment, and also to elect a recorder, steward, and common clerk; but none of these officers are to act without having first obtained the approbation of the crown. They may also annually elect a sheriff, and any one refusing to act may be fined or imprisoned, and excluded from all the privileges of the city. The burghage tenants hold an annual court-leet, at which constables are appointed. One of the brethren acts as coroner, and there are a sword-bearer, two sergeants-at-mace, and subordinate officers. The jurisdiction of the corporation does not extend over the close of the cathedral, where the dean and chapter have peculiar privileges.

The freedom of the city is acquired by purchase or servitude, and inherited by the eldest sons of freemen. The incorporated companies are seven, viz. bakers, butchers, curriers, dyers, saddlers, smiths, and tailors. The city has returned two members to parliament since the 49th Henry III. Under the reform act, two members continue to be returned for the city and Canwick commune; the number of new electors is about 700. The voters under the former system were the bailiffs, magistrates, burgage tenants, freeholders to the amount of 40s. per annum, and enrolled freemen, all paying scot and lot. The number was not less than 1300. Here is a guild-hall, with a gaol, and apartments for the several courts. A theatre was erected in 1790, and a good library has been established for many years. Races take place in the vicinity in March and September.

Population, &c.—The population, in 1801, was 4712; in 1811, 5022; in 1821, 6075; and in 1831, 6499. About one half of the inhabitants are employed in trade and manufactures. Tuesday and Friday are market-days; fairs for cattle, sheep, geese, cheese, and bacon, are held on January 10th, Shrove-Tuesday, Ash-Wednesday, May 12th, and first Tuesday in November. The Birmingham canal passes in the immediate vicinity. Lichfield is celebrated for its ale; and there are manufactures of carpets and sheeting.

Ecclesiastical Affairs.—Lichfield is a bishop's see connected with Coventry, and is the sole seat of the diocese, the buildings at Coventry having been destroyed. The chapter continues the same as in the time of Tanner, from whose history we have already quoted an account of the establishment of the see. The revenues of the bishopric were valued, 26th Henry VIII., at £796 17s. 6d. in the whole, and £703 5s. 2d. clear; and the common revenues of the chapter at £436 10s. 3d. in the whole, and £275 13s. 2d. clear. The revenues of the bishop are at present rated at £559 17s. 3½d. The diocese comprehends 557 parishes, of which 250 are impropriate. It extends over the county of Stafford—excepting the parishes of Brome and Clent—the county of Derby, the greater part of the county of Warwick, and nearly the half of Salop.

"The cathedral is supposed to have been erected about 667, during the bishopric of Juranan. It was rebuilt in 700 by Bishop Headda, who dedicated it to St Chad, and removed his bones from Stowe church to Lichfield. Roger de Clinton erected a great part of the present building. Walter de Langton built the portion of it called St Mary's chapel, as well as the cloisters; and at an expense of £2000, he raised a shrine to the memory of St Chad. The cathedral received great injury from the sieges of the town during the civil wars. Bishop Hacket repaired the damage which it then sustained; and, in the year 1788, it underwent a complete repair by private subscription, under the superintendence of Mr James Wyatt of London. The extent of the whole cathedral from east to west is 411 feet, and from north to south, 167. It is adorned with three elegant steeples, one in the centre of the building and 258 feet in height, and the others at the west end, 183 feet high. The western front was formerly enriched with the finest sculpture, from subjects of Scripture history; but several of these were removed in 1749 by order of the dean and chapter, and the rest have been much injured by the gradual influence of time. On the summit of the roof, between the two spires, is a statue of Charles II., who had contributed timber towards the repair of the church. It was the work of Sir William Wilson, and is supposed to occupy the place of a mere ancient one of Adam or of our Saviour. The portico of the cathedral is not excelled by any in Britain, and contains the richest and lightest sculpture. Within the porch are placed the Evangelists, holding the Gospels in their hands. On the two sides are Moses and Aaron; and in the centre, between the great doors, are the Virgin and child. These were formerly richly painted and gilt. The south and north entrances to the cathedral are very fine, particularly the north door, which is rich in the most beautiful sculptured moulding. The roof of the cathedral was once covered with lead, for which slates have been substituted. The body of the cathedral is lofty and spacious, supported by pillars, formed by numerous slender columns with neat foliated capitals. The length of the body, from the great west door to the choir, is 213 feet, its breadth 153 feet, the breadth of the aisles 66 feet, and the height of the nave 60 feet. The upper rows of windows are triangular, including three circles in each. Over the great west door is a magnificent circular window, formed at the expense of James, duke of York, in the reign of Charles II. The painted glass was the gift of Dean Addenbrooke, in 1776. There are many interesting monuments in this church. The principal are—one to Launcelot Addison, father of the great Addison; one to Lady Mary Wortley Montague, representing the goddess of beauty weeping over an urn; one to Garrick; one to Dr Johnson; one, by Chantry, to the infant children of Mrs Robinson; and some of the older bishops, which escaped the injuries inflicted by the troops of the parliament. The choir and St Mary's chapel were formerly separated by an elegant architectural screen, but during the late alterations the two were thrown into one. St Mary's chapel is uncommonly beautiful and magnificent. It contains nine windows, three on each side and three at the end. The slender east windows are filled with painted glass, which Sir Brooke Boothby purchased from the dissolved abbey of Herkenrode, in the bishopric of Liege. Sir Brooke transferred his purchase to the dean and chapter. It consisted of 340 pieces, each 22 inches square, and the whole expense, including carriage and fitting up, amounted to £1,100. The centre window, on the same side, exhibits the resurrection, executed by Mr Egginton from a design by Sir Joshua Reynolds. The organ has 25 stops, and is considered a fine instrument. Both sides of the choir are adorned with 25 stalls. The library, founded by Dean Heywood, contains several valuable books and MSS. One of the latter is an ancient copy of the Valor of Pope Nicholas, in the time of Edward I.; another is the Textus St Cædæ, or the gospels of St Chad, written in Saxon characters, and supposed to be about 1000 years old. There is here also a Koran, which was taken from the Turks at the siege of Buda. To the north of St Mary's chapel is a smaller chapel, in which two of the Mercian kings were buried. The bishop's palace stands at the north-east corner of the Close. It is a spacious stone edifice, bearing the date 1687, and the arms of the bishopric. As the bishops now reside at Eccleshall castle, this palace is generally occupied by tenants, and was long the residence of the family of the Swards. The deanery-house stands to the west of the palace, and the houses of the prebends are situated in different parts of the Close.—Brewster's Encyclopædia.

Living.—St Mary's is a discharged vicarage, in the peculiar jurisdiction and patronage of the dean and chapter of Lichfield, and rated at £10.—The living of St Chad's is a perpetual curacy, a peculiar of the dean and chapter, not in charge, returned at £89 10s., and in the patronage of the vicar of St Mary's. The church is an ancient structure.—The living of St Michael's is a perpetual curacy, a peculiar of the dean and chapter, not in charge, returned at £91 12s., and in the patronage of the vicar of St Mary's.—The Independents, Kilhamites, Roman Catholics, and Wesleyan Methodists, have places of worship here.

Schools.—Here is a free grammar school, founded by Edward VI. Its income is small, and there are but six scholars on the foundation, others being admitted on the payment of fees. Here are other schools with moderate endowments, and a national and British school for boys, supported by subscription.

Benevolent Institutions.—In this city is an hospital dedicated to St John the Baptist. It was founded in the reign of Henry III. by the bishop of Lichfield, and has been enriched by subsequent benefactions. The annual revenue now amounts to £350, about £150 of which are paid to the master, who must be in priest's orders, and is appointed by the bishop of Lichfield and Coventry. There are here a schoolmaster, chaplain, a matron, and 13 almsmen, who reside in the house. The almsmen receive 13s. 6d. each, weekly.—Here is an hospital for 15 aged women, founded in 1424, and endowed by various benefactors. The income is about £370, and the expenditure is not so great, so that it is in contemplation to extend the benefits of the charity.—Here are also a dispensary, and numerous bequests, producing upwards of £1000 per annum, for the benefit of the poor.

Here was a house of Grey friars. Some parts of the buildings yet remain. This was the birth-place of Elias Ashmole, who founded at Oxford the library named after him; of Dr Newton, bishop of Bristol; and of Dr Samuel Johnson. Dr Darwin, author of the Zoonomia, Botanic Garden, &c., practised here as a physician. Distance from London, 119 m. N.W. by N.

LICKHILL, a hamlet in the parish of Kidderminster, co. of Worcester.

Near the church is the seat of Lord Bolingbroke. Distance from Swindon, 4 m. W. by N. Pop., in 1801, 578; in 1831, 765. A. P., £8,209.

LIDDINGTON, a parish in the hundred of Wrangdikes, co. of Rutland. Living, a discharged vicarage, in the peculiar jurisdiction of the prebendary of Liddington in Lincoln cathedral, rated at £8 2s., and in the patronage of the dean and chapter of Lincoln. The church is ded. to St Andrew, and there is a chapel-of-ease at Caldecott. The Wesleyan Methodists have a place of worship here. Here is a school in which five poor children receive instruction on a foundation of £9 16s. 10d. per annum. Here is an hospital for a warden, 12 brethren, and two nurses, founded in 1600 by Lord Burghley. The building is a fine structure, in the early style of English architecture, which was formerly a palace of the bishops of Lincoln. The prebend of Liddington in Lincoln cathedral, is rated at £20 0s. 10d., and in the patronage of the bishop. Distance from Uppingham, 2½ m. S. by E. Pop., in 1801, 527; in 1831, 534. A. P., £4,131.

LIDDINGTON, a parish in the hundred of Kingsbridge, co. of Wilts. The living consists of a sinecure rectory, rated at £14, and of a discharged vicarage, rated at £17, and in the archd. of Wilts and dio. of Salisbury. The patronage of the rectory belonged, in 1829, to the duke of Marlborough; that of the vicarage to the rector. Church ded. to All Saints. Here are traces of an ancient entrenchment called Lyddington castle. Distance from Swindon, 4 m. E.S.E. Pop., in 1801, 337; in 1831, 407. A. P., £3,400.

LIDGATE, a parish in the hundred of Risbridge, co. of Suffolk. Living, a rectory in the archd. of Sudbury and dio. of Norwich, rated at £15 10s. 5d., and, in 1829, in the patronage of the duke of Rutland. Church ded. to St Mary. Here was anciently a castle, the history of which has been lost. Distance from Newmarket, 7 m. S.E. by E. Pop., in 1801, 323; in 1831, 442. A. P., £1,438.

LIDLINGTON, or LITLINGTON, a parish in the hundred of Redbornestoke, co. of Bedford. Distance from Amphill, 3¼ m. W. by N. Pop., in 1801, 559; in 1831, 814. A. P., £3,586.

LIDNEY, or LYDNEY, a market-town and parish in the hundred of Blideaslow, co. of Gloucester. It is situated in the district called the forest of Dean, and appears to have been the site of a Roman station. Antiquaries, however, differ about its name, some supposing it to be the Abona, others the Trajectus, of Richard of Cirencester. Living, a vicarage, to which are annexed the perpetual curacies of St Briavell's and Huelsfield, in the archd. of Hereford and dio. of Gloucester, rated at £24 6s. 8d., and in the patronage of the dean and chapter of Hereford. The church is a spacious structure, ded. to St Mary. Here are some chalybeate springs; and coal has been found, but has not been wrought to a great extent. Here is a railway from the Severn to the Wye. The Severn runs along the eastern side of the parish, and affords the means of conveyance for the mineral productions of the forest of Dean. Wednesday is market-day, but it is scarcely attended, the importance of the town having fallen considerably for a century back. Fairs for horned cattle are held on the 4th May and 8th November. Here is Lidney park, the seat of the Right Hon. Charles Bragge Bathurst, erected on the site of Whitecross, the house of Sir William Winter, vice-admiral of England under Queen Elizabeth. It was fortified and defended for the royal cause by his descendant, Sir John Winter, in the reign of Charles I., who, on the fall of the king, removed from his house and burnt it to the ground. Here have been discovered the remains of a Roman villa, a bath, and many coins, urns, pieces of sculpture, and pavements. Here are also traces of two extensive entrenchments. Distance from London, 123 m. W. by N. Pop., in 1801, 783; in 1831, 1534. A. P., £6,887.

II., p. 3, m. 26; but it is more certain, that about a quarter of a mile from the left bank of the river Lugg, was a priory of nuns of the order of St Augustine, founded by some of the Mortimers as early as Richard I., which continued till the general suppression, when it had six nuns, and was endowed with £23 17s. 8d. per annum. It was granted, 7th Edward VI., to John Wes and Robert Gratwick."—Tanner's Not. Mon.

LIMEHOUSE, a parish in the Tower division of the hundred of Ossulstone, co. of Middlesex. It is within the bills of mortality of the metropolis, and formed part of the parish of St Dunstan, Stepney, till the year 1730, when it was erected into a distinct parish. It lies on the northern bank of the river Thames, and is bounded on three sides by the parish of Stepney. The name is said to have been formerly written Limehurst, and to have been derived from the number of lime-trees which formerly flourished here. The streets are generally narrow and irregular, but contain many respectable houses, and partially paved and lighted with gas. The principal manufactures are those of ropes, various kinds of iron-work, sail-cloth, masts, oars, pumps, and blocks, and other articles connected with the shipping. Here are several extensive ship-building establishments, and in the immediate vicinity are the great West India docks. The Limehouse cut, connecting the river Lea with the Thames, crosses this parish. The Regent's canal also communicates with the Thames at this place. The commercial road from Whitechapel to the East and West India docks, constructed in 1829 and 1830, under the superintendence of Mr James Walker, at an expense of nearly £20,000. The living is a rectory not in charge, in the archd. of Middlesex and dio. of London, and in the patronage of Brasenose college, Oxford. The church, which was erected in 1712 and subsequent years, is ded. to St Anne. It is the work of Nicholas Hawksmoor, and is a massive Gothic structure, with a tower at the west end. The Wesleyan Methodists have a place of worship here. Here is a charity school for boys, formerly erected with that of Poplar, and founded by Dr Glos-ter Ridley, in 1737. Here is a well endowed school for 350 boys and 150 girls, who are educated on the national system. The master receives £80, and the mistress £70. The whole income amounts to £589 10s. Pop. of this parish, in 1801, 4678; in 1831, 15,695. A. P., £31,040.

LINCOLN,

A city and county in itself, locally situated in the county of Lincoln. It appears to have been a fortified place of the ancient Britons, and under the Romans it was the site of a station called Lindum Colonia, through which the Ermine-street passed. Part of the original structures of the Roman fort yet remains, in a gateway of three arches called Newport gate. After the decline of the Roman power in Britain, Lincoln became capital of the Saxon kingdom of Mercia. It was the scene of many conflicts, first between the original Britons and Saxons, and afterwards between the latter and the Danes. A castle was erected here by William the Conqueror, and several monarchs resided occasionally here. In 1140, the castle was taken by the partizans of Matilda, who were besieged here by Stephen, but relieved by the duke of Gloucester, who took Stephen prisoner. King John received here the homage of David of Scotland, and was subsequently besieged here by his turbulent barons, whom he succeeded for a considerable time in repelling by the aid of the townsmen. It was finally taken by Gilbert de Gaunt. The castle afterwards became the property of the celebrated John of Gaunt. Parliaments were held here by Edward I., II., and III. During the civil war, the inhabitants of Lincoln embraced the royal cause, and suffered considerably from the attacks of the parliamentary armies.

Description.—The town is situated on the bank of the river Witham, partly on a rising ground which is crowned by the cathedral, and partly along the valley below. The streets are paved, lighted with gas, and contain many respectable houses. The river is crossed by several bridges, and a supply of water is obtained partly from wells and partly from public conduits. Here are some remains of the castle and the palace of John of Gaunt. Here is the county gaol erected on the site of part of the castle, and constructed with great judgment on the plan of Mr Howard. The new county hall is an elegant structure, erected in 1823 at an expense of £40,000. The guildhall was erected on the site of an ancient structure in the reign of Richard II. Its general aspect is pleasing, and some of the carved ornaments are very well executed. Here are several excellent libraries and newrooms, assembly-rooms, and a theatre. Races are held in the vicinity in September.

Population, Trade, &c.—The pop. in 1801, was 7197; in 1831, 11,892. A. P., £41,396. In 1351, the staple of cloths, lead, and leather, were given to this town, but manufactures have not flourished here. There is a considerable trade in corn, which is greatly facilitated by the improved state of the Fosse dyke, a Roman canal which forms a communication between the rivers Witham and Trent. The market day is Friday, when corn, butter, butcher meat, fish and cattle are sold at their respective stations in different parts of the town: The fairs are April 24th, 25th, 26th, and 27th, for sheep and pedlery; July 5th, last Wednesday in July, and every second Wednesday for cattle and sheep; October 6th, November 28th, for horses and cattle. Besides these there are statute fairs for hiring servants, on the 1st, 2d, and 3d Fridays after old May day.

Municipal Government, &c.—The town is governed under a charter of Charles I., dated 1628, and was erected into a separate county by George I., including a district within 20 miles around. The corporation consists of a mayor, 12 aldermen, 2 sheriffs, 4 coroners, 26 common-councilmen, and 4 chamberlains. These are assisted by a recorder, town-clerk, and other officers. The mayor is a justice of the peace, and continues so for life. He holds his office for a year, and the senior alderman is usually appointed. The freedom of the city is obtained by servitude, purchase, or gift, and descends to all sons of freemen. The corporation holds quarterly courts of session, weekly petty sessions, and a court of record every second week. The assizes for the county, the petty sessions for the parts of Kesteven, and those for the parts of Lincoln are held here. A court of requests for the recovery of debts under 40s., is held by commissioners appointed under an act of the 24th George II. The city returns two members to parliament. The number of voters under the Reform act, is above 700. The former voters were the freemen generally,—upwards of 1200 in number. The 40s. freeholders in this city vote for the parts of Lindsey.

Ecclesiastical Affairs.—Lincoln was made an episcopal see by William Rufus, in 1085. "A short time before this," says Matthew Paris, "he had given the bishopric of Dorchester to Remigius; but it displeased that bishop to have so inconsiderable a town assigned him for his see, when in the same diocese was the city of Lincoln, so much more worthy to be an episcopal residence; wherefore, having purchased some lands on the top of that hill, he built a church on that spot. And although the archbishop of York asserted that the city belonged to his diocese, Remigius made little account of his claim, and pursued the work he had so commenced with such diligence, that he completed it, and filled it with a clergy most approved for doctrine and morals." The diocese originally comprehended part of the present see of Ely, and those of Oxford and Peterborough; the first being taken away by Henry II., and the others by Henry VIII. The chapter consists of the bishop, dean, precentor, chancellor, subdean, 6 archdeacons, 52 prebendaries, 4 vicars, 8 vicars choral, with an organist, 7 poor clerks, 8 choristers, chaunters, &c. "The revenues of this bishopric were valued, 26th Henry VIII., at £2,095 12s. 5d. in the whole, and at £1,962 17s. 4d. clear; but a great many of the old manors and estates having been granted from the bishopric, it is now rated at only £830 18s. 1d., and the dividend money of the chapter at £546 2s. 6d."—Tanner's Not. Mon. The cathedral is dedicated to St Mary. It is situated near the castle on the summit of the hill, and is a superb specimen of the early style of English architecture, with a mixture of Norman. At the west end are two towers 180 feet in height, and a massive square tower rises from the intersection of the nave, and transepts to the altitude of 270 feet. The whole length of the structure is 255 feet, the extreme breadth 222 feet. The interior is uncommonly rich, and contains many specimens of most elaborate carving, especially the bishop's throne and prebendal stalls. There are several small, but exquisitely beautiful chapels, and the cloisters remain nearly entire. The library and chapter-house, especially the latter, are well worthy of attention as elegant pieces of architecture. This church was formerly very wealthy, and afforded a large plunder in gold, silver, and precious stones, to Henry VIII. The interior contains numerous monuments. In the north-western tower hung one of the largest bells in England, called 'Great Tom of Lincoln', which was unfortunately broken in 1831 while under repair.

The diocese of Lincoln contains 1380 parishes. Of the episcopal palace there are some remains, as also of the ancient monastery to which the cathedral was attached.

Livinge, &c.—Lincoln was anciently divided into 52 parishes, 34 of which lost their churches previous to the reign of Edward VI. The following are at present in existence: they are all in the archdeaconry and diocese of Lincoln.—St Benedict's is a curacy not in charge, endowed with £2000, in the patronage of the prebendary of North Kelsey; the church presents some ancient Norman architecture.—St Botolph's is a curacy not in charge, endowed with £800, and in the patronage of the prebendary of Botolph's.—St John's in Newport is a vicarage not in charge, endowed with £400, and in the patronage of the prebendary of Dunholme. The church is in ruins.—St Margaret's in the Close, Bail, and city, is a perpetual curacy, united in 1778 to St Peter in the east gate. Its endowment is £600, and the patron is the prebendary of Haydior.—Mark's is a perpetual curacy, endowed with £800, not in charge. The church is in ruins. The precentor of Lincoln is patron.—St Martin's is a discharged vicarage, rated at £4 12 4d., and in the patronage of the prebendary the same.—St Mary's in Wigford is a discharged vicarage, rated at £5 3s. 9d. The church is in the Norman style, and the patronage belongs to the prebendary of Greston.—St Mary Magdalen's in the Close and Bail; a discharged rectory, rated at £5, and in the patronage of the dean and chapter.—St Michael's on the Mount is a perpetual curacy not in charge, endowed with £1,800, and in the patronage of the precentor of Lincoln.—St Nicholas in Newport is a vicarage not in charge, in the patronage of the dean and chapter. The church is in ruins.—St Paul's in the Bail is a discharged rectory, rated at £2 5s. 10d. The archdeacon of Lincoln is patron.—St Peter's at Arches is a discharged rectory, rated at £5 12s. 8d. The church is a modern structure, and the patronage belongs to the crown.—St Peter's in Eastgate is a perpetual curacy, to which, in 1778, that of St Margaret was added, endowed with £400, and in the patronage of the precentor of Lincoln.—St Peter's at Goat's is a discharged curacy, endowed with £1600. The church is an ancient Norman structure, and the precentor of Lincoln is patron.—St Swithin's is a perpetual curacy, endowed with £1000, and in the patronage of the precentor of Lincoln.—The parishes of All Saints Bracebridge, All Saints Brantson, All Saints Canwick, and St Michael Waddington, are within the county of the city. In the city are the nominal vicarages of All Saints, St Andrew's, St Mary Cratchpool, and the Holy Cross, which appear to have merged into other livings, as they have neither parishes nor endowments. In a similar condition is the curacy of St Bartholomew's. The Baptists, Society of Friends, Huntingdonians, Independents, Wesleyan Methodists, Roman Catholics and Unitarians have places of worship here.

Schools, &c.—Here is an ancient free grammar school in which about 25 boys receive gratuitous instruction. Here are also a blue-coat, Jersey, free, and national schools, well supported by endowment or subscription. About 600 children receive education in these establishments. Here are a county hospital, general dispensary, lunatic asylum, Dorcas society, &c., generally very well supported. There are also various endowments for the benefit of the poor.

Leland says, "Where the deane of Lyncolne's howse is, in the Minstar Close of Lyncolne and thereabout, was a monasterye of nunes afore the time that Remigius began the new mynstar of Lyncolne." Tanner says,—"Here were also a Gilbertine priory dedicated to St Catherine, a Benedictine cell dedicated to St Mary Magdalene, the priory of St Bartholomew, Cantilupe college, the hospitals of Beningworth, St Giles, the Holy Innocents, St Mary, the Holy Sepulchre, and houses of Austin, Black, Grey, and White friars; and in one of the suburbs of this city was a house of friars de Sacca." The duke of Newcastle takes the title of earl from this city. Distance from London, 132 m. N. by W.

LINCOLNSHIRE,

A maritime county on the eastern coast of England. It is bounded on the north and north-west by the county of York, from which it is in a great measure separated by the Humber and its estuary; on the west by the county of Nottingham; on the south-west by Leicester and Rutland; and on the south by the counties of Northampton and Cambridge. The German ocean sweeps round it on the east, and the general form of the whole county resembles that of a semicircular area, the circular portion being washed by the sea. It extends from 53° 28' to 53° 54' lat. N., and from 1° E. long. to 1° 3' W. long. Its extreme length is about 70 m., its breadth 45, and its circumference 260, and it comprehends an area variously computed at from 2747 to 2814 square miles. The number of acres is variously estimated between 1,758,000 and 1,893,100. It has been calculated that about 473,000 acres exist as inclosed, marah, and fen land; 200,000 as commons, wastes, and unembanked salt marshes; 268,000 of common fields; 25,000 of woodlands; and 927,120 of inclosed upland. According to the division of Mr Young, it consists of 234,880 acres of wolds, 178,400 heath, 776,960 lowland, and 718,880 miscellaneous. As these returns are now rather old, and as, from the inclosure of commons and draining of fens, many alterations are gradually progressing, they are not to be relied on as exhibiting an accurate picture of the state of the county at the present moment.

Divisions, &c.—Lincoln forms part of the province of Canterbury and dio. of Lincoln. It is divided into the archdeaconries of Lincoln and Stow, and contains 305 rectories, 234 vicarages, and 70 perpetual curacies. The archdeaconry of Lincoln comprehends the deaneries of Aswardhurn cum Lafford, Aveland, Beltsloe, Bolingbroke, Candleshoe, Calceworth, Gartree, Grantham, Graffo, Grimsby, Hill, Holland, Horncastle, Lincoln, Longobovey, Loveden, Louth-Eske, Ness, Stamford, Walshcroft, Wrangoe, and Yarborough. That of Stow comprises the deaneries of Aslaoce, Corringham, Lawren, and Manley.

The great civil divisions of the county are called parts, respectively, of Lindsey, Kesteven, and Holland. The parts of Lindsey extend from the sea to the borders of Nottingham, and from the river Witham to the Humber, comprehending a space nearly equal to half the county. This division comprehends the city and county of the city of Lincoln, 15 hundreds, 2 soke, 19 market-towns, and 431 villages. The hundreds or wapentakes are those of Aslaoce, Bradley-Haverstoe, Calceworth, Candleshoe, Corringham, Gartree, Hill, Lawren, Low-Eske, Ludborough, Manley, Walshcroft, Wall, Wrangoe, and Yarborough. The soke are those of Bolingbroke and Horncastle.—The division of Kesteven forms the south-western portion of the county; it is bounded on the north and north-east by the river Witham; on the east by the parts of Holland; on the south by the river Walland; and on the west by the counties of Nottingham, Leicester, and Rutland. It contains nine wapentakes, the town of Stamford, the town and soke of Grantham, seven market-towns, and 190 villages. The hundreds are Aswardhurn, Aveland, Beltsloe, Boothby-Graffo, Flaxwell, Langoe, Loveden, Ness, and Winnibriggs with Threo.—The parts of Holland are bounded on the north by the division of Lindsey; on the west by that of Kesteven; on the south by the counties of Cambridge and Northampton; and on the east by the sea, and contains three wapentakes, with the town of Boston. The wapentakes are those of Elloe, Kilton, and Skirbeck. The county contains one city, which returns two members to parliament, the market-towns and boroughs of Boston, Grantham, Grimsby, and Stamford, each of which returns two members; and the market-towns of Alford, Barton-upon-Humber, Bolingbroke, Bourne, Calster, Donnington, Epworth, Falkingham, Gainsborough, Glandford-bridge, Holbeach, Horncastle, Kilton, Louth, Market-Deeping, Market-Raisen, Sleaford, Spelding, Spilsby, Long Sutton, Swineshead, Tattersall, Wainfleet, and Wragby. Four members of parliament are returned for the county under the reform act. The two for the parts of Lindsey are elected at Lincoln; and the two for the parts of Kesteven and Holland at Sleaford. There are 630 parishes in this county, which are all in the archdeaconry and diocese of Lincoln and province of Canterbury. The county is within the midland circuit, and has 110 acting magistrates, who hold quarter-sessions at Boston, Bourne, Falkingham, Kilton, Louth, and Spilsby.

Population.—The population of the county, in 1801, was 215,500, in 50,904 families; 29,881 of which were employed in agriculture, and 13,184 in trade and manufactures. The population was thus 15 to the square mile. In 1811, the population was 237,891; in 1831, 283,058; and in 1831, 317,244.

Physical Features.—The natural divisions of the county are the wolds, heaths, and fens. Mr Young computes the wolds to extend over 234,880 acres. They are ridges of hills, of no great altitude, but, from the flatness of a large portion of the county, sometimes commanding extensive views. They extend from near Barton-on-Humber, southward, to Spilsby, running into two parallel lines, at the distance of eight miles, the country between being uneven. A range of hills, passing from north to south in a straight line, in the meridian of the city of Lincoln, is called the heaths. The fens are partly in the district of Kesteven, but chiefly in that of Holland. The greatest division of the fenny country is the marsh. This is an extensive tract of land, lying on the sea coast, to the east of the wolds, varying in breadth from eight to ten miles, and protected by embankments from the encroachments of the sea.

It extends over the greater part of the coast, and has been at various times embanked and cultivated, and now constitutes one of the most fertile parts of the kingdom. Other extensive fens are Deeping fen, near Market-Deeping; Holland fen and West fen, within six miles of Boston; East fen, near Wainfleet; an extensive tract in the hundred of Langoe, extending along the river Witham; the Ancholme level, extending along the river of that name for at least ten miles; and the Isle of Axholme, a large space included between the rivers Don and Trent at the north-western angle of the county. Of these fens many portions have been brought under cultivation, the water being carried off in ditches, terminating in larger fosses called dykes, some of which are so large as to be navigable by barges. The Deeping fen appears to have been partly improved even before the conquest, and there are remains of ancient embankments on the coast, attributed to the Romans. The draining of the Isle of Axholme commenced in the reign of Edward I., and at various periods large portions of land have been brought under cultivation. In the middle of last century the drainage was completed, and the whole extent of land gained is 17,197 acres. In the parish of Long Sutton, and in Spalding, Moulton, Whalpole, Holbeach, and Godney, 15,331 acres of salt marsh have been reclaimed. In Deeping fen 15,000 acres have been drained; in Holland fen, 22,000; in Alnwick fen, 1097; in the fenny district, extending along the Witham near Lincoln, about 20 or 30 square miles have been recovered; and in East and West fens upwards of 30,000 acres; the value of which is rated at two millions, while the expense was not more than £400,000. The whole extent of land gained by embankment and draining in this county is estimated at 180,000 acres; and there still remains much to be done, especially in the district called South Holland, where not less than 100,000 acres remain in the state of fens or salt marsh. The climate is in general cold and damp, and much rain falls, especially during the prevalence of east and north winds, in summer. Agues are common in the fenny districts, but become less frequent everywhere, in proportion as the land is brought under cultivation.

Soil.—The soil varies considerably in different parts of the county. Sandy loam, with a substratum of sandstone, is common in the heath division; sand and sandy loam, with chalk, in the wolds. The marsh land is in some places exceedingly rich, in others it consists of a cold stiff clay. The Isle of Axholme presents the most fertile soil in England, consisting of black loam and other rich earths, with a substratum of imperfect plaster-stone. Various degrees of sandy and loamy soils are to be met with in different parts of the county. Peat, deep sandy loam, and rich soapy blue clay, are found in the fens. What is called the soak, is the subterraneous water which usually appears at the depth of a few feet below the surface, and in the vicinity of the sea is salt. In dry seasons, the porous mass from which this flows absorbs the moisture of the surface, and causes vegetation to suffer from want of moisture, even in places which were once fens, and are still liable to inundation from their situation under high water-mark. It ought to have been mentioned before, that during heavy rains these lands are often under water, from the quantity being too great to pass off by the sluices during the short period that these can remain open.

Sea Coast.—The sea coast of Lincoln is generally low, and the distance between high and low water mark is sometimes not less than two miles. "There are many banks called chain-huts, which are dry at low water; these are composed of roots, trunks, and branches of trees, intermixed with leaves of aquatic plants. The trees are chiefly birch, fir, and oak; trunks of great trees are likewise found in the fens. These circumstances prove that not only the fenny part of the county, but also the coast, has undergone considerable changes. In some parts the sea has gained on the land, and in other parts it has retired. Wrangle, in the wapentake of Skirbeck, in the division of Holland, now a village between two and three miles from the sea, was a port in the time of Edward III., and sent one ship to the siege of Calais in 1346. Wainfleet, at the same period, sent two, and indeed continued a haven of considerable importance, till the stream which flowed near it was diverted towards Boston. On the other hand, the sea has encroached near Skegness; this is now a village, but formerly was a large walled town. According to Leland, walls, town, church and all, were eaten up by the sea."

Rivers.—The principal rivers of Lincolnshire are the Trent, Welland, Witham, and Ancholme.—The Trent touches the county near Newton-upon-Trent, just where it is joined by the Dike, which connects it with the Witham. It runs along the border of the county in a direction due north, passing Gainsborough, as far as East Stockwith, a distance of 15 miles. Continuing nearly the same direction, it passes on the one side the wapentakes of Corringham and Manley, and on the other the Isle of Ancholme, and falls into the upper part of the estuary of the Humber. Considerable vessels can ascend to Gainsborough, and barges as far as its junction with the Dike, which is further navigable to Lincoln.—The Welland first touches the county near Stamford, near the point where the counties of Lincoln, Rutland, and Northampton meet, bounds the county as far as Market-Deeping, turns to the north-west, and finally debouches in the Wash, to the south of Boston.—The Ancholme rises in the wolds, to the west of Market-Raisen, and after running westward for a few miles turns to the north, and runs towards the Humber, into which it falls. It passes Glandford-bridge, and has been rendered navigable to Bishop's-bridge, a distance of 8 miles from its source. The artificial cut sometimes follows and sometimes leaves the natural course of the river. It gives off a branch of 5 m. in length, called the Caistor canal.—The Witham rises on the borders of the counties of Lincoln and Rutland, near South Witham. It runs north to Grantham, whence it turns to the west, approaching the border of Nottingham. From Leug Bennington it bends northward, and runs parallel to the high grounds as far as Lincoln, where it passes to the eastward through an interruption in the ridge of hills, and by a sweep towards the south-east reaches Boston, below which it falls into the sea. This river is generally shallow, but it has been deepened to facilitate the escape of the water from the fenny countries through which it passes. From Boston to near Tattersall the channel is entirely artificial, and the whole is navigable for small vessels to Lincoln.

Canals.—There are several canals in this county. The most ancient canal in England is the Foss-dyke, which was dug by the Romans as a drain to protect the low countries from the water flowing from the heaths. In the reign of Henry I. it was enlarged and rendered navigable, and connected the rivers Witham and Trent. It fell into decay, and was unnavigable from accumulation of sand, when Mr Ellis of Thorne, in the middle of last century, obtained a lease of it, and effected its restoration. It was finally repaired in 1826, and now completes the communication between Lincolnshire and the chain of inland navigation connected with the Trent and Ouse.—A canal extends from Sleaford to the river Witham.—The Grantham canal runs from that town to the Trent, near Holme in Nottinghamshire, a distance of 30 m., with a fall of 148 feet. It was finished in 1796, at an expense of £100,000.—From Horncastle a canal runs 10 m. south to the river Witham.—The Louth canal runs due north from that town, and is partly formed in the channel of the river Leed, with which it joins the sea after a course of 11 m.

Roads.—The roads of greatest importance are—that from London to Hull, which runs in nearly a right line northwards from Market-Deeping to Barton-on-Humber. It passes Bourne, Folkingham, Sleaford, Lincoln, where it joins the ancient Ermyng-street, and Glandford-bridge; the road from London to Edinburgh passes through about 12 m. of the south-western part of the county.

Animals, &c.—Of mineral products Lincolnshire presents little variety, and the substratum is chiefly alluvial. Blue marl has been found in small quantities; chalk exists in the wolds, and sandstone in the heathy district.—Of animals, the greatest variety is in birds, chiefly aquatic; which, however, the draining of the fens has contributed to drive away. Wild ducks are numerous, and are much sought after, being taken in what are called decoys. "The most considerable and numerous decoys are in the Holland division of this county. They are formed of pools surrounded by woods, and from these pools there are small drains called pipes. When the proper season arrives they are inclosed by nets, and by means of a decoy bird the wild fowl are induced to enter the pool through a drain thus covered: when they have entered the channel the net is drawn, and they are inclosed and taken. The general season for catching is from the end of October to February. The decoys of Lincolnshire supply the market of London with wild fowl; the number taken is said to be immense; it is said that 10 decoys in the West fen, during one winter, supplied 31,200."

Agriculture.—The agriculture of Lincolnshire has long been celebrated. There are some large estates, but many farmers work their own ground from four to five hundred acres in extent. The land is chiefly freehold, except in the low districts, and leases are not common. The arable land forms a small proportion of the county. Wheat, oats, barley, hemp, woad, rape, cabbages, turnips, and sainfoin, are the principal crops, but no rotation seems to be generally practised. Onions are raised to a great extent in the Isle of Axholme, and under favourable circumstances, yield a return of £50 an acre. Wheat yields $3\frac{1}{2}$ quarters, barley $4\frac{1}{2}$, but neither are of the first quality; the produce of oats average $6\frac{1}{2}$ quarters, and is of excellent quality. Beans yield $3\frac{1}{2}$ quarters an acre, and sainfoin yields a plentiful crop, lasting from 9 to 14 years. Along with the artificial grasses, the various species of trefoil are much cultivated. The grazing lands of Lincolnshire are uncommonly rich, and very extensive. The short-horned Lincolnshire, and the long-horned Leicestershire cattle, are bred here to great advantage, chiefly for the butcher. There are no proper dairy farms, except perhaps a very few in the vicinity of the larger towns. Oxen are frequently employed in husbandry. The sheep are chiefly of the large Lincoln and Leicestershire breeds; their number is said to be near two millions and a half. Hogs are numerous, and the breed is improving. The horses are remarkably fine, and are chiefly sold in the markets of Yorkshire. Many extensive rabbit-warrens exist, but are generally on the decline, the rich land of old rabbit-warrens having been found very advantageous for tillage. Geese are also bred to a large extent, chiefly for the sake of their feathers; and the shameful practice of live-plucking prevails very generally. Drainage, manuring, paring, and burning, are practised with great success. "The most singular and beneficial mode of improvement practised in Lincolnshire is warping; this may be shortly described as permitting the tide to flow over the land at high, and letting it off at low, water. The water of the tides that come up the Ouse, Trent, Don, and other rivers which form the Humber, is extremely muddy; by permitting these waters to flow over the land and remain there till the returning tide carries them off, the soil will be raised in the course of one summer from 6 to 16 inches; and this deposited soil is of the richest quality, consisting of argillaceous and siliceous earth, with a very large proportion of mucilage. In order to warp land, a canal is made from the river, with a sluice at the mouth; and that the water may be of a proper depth on the land to be warped, and also to prevent its flowing over the adjoining lands, banks are raised round the fields that are to be warped. Hence, it will be evident that the expense is very great, but the wonderful fertility thus bestowed on the lands fully compensates it."—Edinburgh Encyclopedia, Vol. xlii.

Trade.—Scarcely any manufactures exist in the county of Lincoln. Flax and hemp are dressed and spun at various places, but not to any important extent.

Poor Rates.—In 1776, the poor rates of this county amounted to £35,632; in 1803, they had risen to £145,848, being raised by a rate of 3s. 7d. in the pound of actual rent. In the latter year 1112 persons were relieved in work-houses, at an expense of £14,936. Out of work-houses 20,824 persons received assistance, at the average expense of £4 10s. 7d. each. Thus, 9 per cent. of the population were in the receipt of charity. In 1815, the poor and other rates amounted to £226,997 18s. 2½d.; in 1827, to £214,750, of which £167,987 12s. was applied to the relief of the poor. Some years ago, about 4 per cent. of the population were connected with friendly societies.

Churches.—The ecclesiastical edifices in this county are in general remarkably fine; no county in the kingdom containing so large a number of elegant churches. The author of one of the histories of this county thus describes them:—"It is a remarkable circumstance, that the most splendid edifices which adorn this district, were erected chiefly in its lowest and most fenny situations, where all communication must formerly have been, and indeed to this day is, extremely difficult. The most beautiful ecclesiastical edifices are in the districts of Kesteven and Holland; those in the division of Lindsey, (with the exception of Lincoln cathedral,) are in general inferior, but in the north-eastern part of Lindsey, a low flat tract, there are several churches of elegant and rich architecture. The date of them is from the reign of Edward III. to that of Henry VIII.; they are built of excellent materials, and, with only two exceptions, their form and character vary very little. In the central part of Kesteven most of the churches are adorned with lofty spires; in the northern and southern parts with towers; their general date is from the 13th to the 15th century. Many of these are excellent specimens of ancient English architecture. In the district of Holland, however, the ecclesiastical architecture of the county appears in its richest style, and with the greatest abundance. In this fenny district are the churches of Boston, Gosberton, Pinchbeck, Spalding, Holbeach, Gedling, Long-Sutton, Croyland, &c., all of which are celebrated for magnificence or beauty. As at the period of their erection, Holland was a complete fen, accessible in many parts only by water, it was necessary to lay artificial foundations of piles, or planks of wood, or different layers of earth and stone; and yet such was the care and skill of the architects, that notwithstanding all these difficulties, few of the churches have swerved from the perpendicular." See LONG-SUTTON, CROYLAND, &c.

History.—This county formed in ancient times a portion of the territory of the Coritani, and was included in the province of the Romana, called Britannia Prima. The Romans had several stations: Ad Alun supposed at Winterton, Aquis at Aukborough, Banocæthum at Horncastle, Causennæ at Ancaster, Croco-colana at Brough, Lindum, and Lincoln, and Vaisona at Wainfleet. It is crossed by the Ermin-street, the Fosse-way, and the Salt-way. The Ermin-street runs from south to north in nearly a right line through the county, passing Lincoln. Various remains of Roman buildings are mentioned under the articles Scampton, Torksey, Stow, Gainsborough, &c. The county formed a part of the Anglo-Saxon kingdom of Mercia. It suffered much from the inroads of the Danes, who held possession of it for a long time, till expelled in 941 by Edward the Elder. It has since been frequently mentioned in history, especially in the reigns of John and Charles I.; but no particular event demands attention in a work like the present.

The family of Bertie takes the title of earl from the parts of Lindsey; that of Fox, the title of baron from the division of Holland.

LINCOLN'S INN, an extra-parochial place in the county of Middlesex, containing 142 inhabitants.

LINDALE, a chapelry in the parish of Cartmel, county of Lancaster. Living, a curacy endowed with £800, and, in 1829, in the patronage of Lord George Cavendish. Distance from Cartmel 3 miles N.E. Pop. with the parish.

Here was a castle of the earls and dukes of Cornwall, long since destroyed. The town is partly built on rocky and irregular ground, and contains good houses; the streets are paved, but not lighted. From the nature of the ground it has a picturesque appearance, and the air is remarkably pure. Here are a handsome market-place and town-hall. This is one of the towns for the stamping of tin. Here are some manufactories of serge, blankets, ropes, and leather, but the town profits most by the transit of tin, copper, and lead, from the mines of the surrounding district. A canal has been carried from Liskeard to Looe, and proves of considerable advantage to traders. Saturday is market-day, and great markets are held on Shrove-Tuesday, the day after Palm-Sunday, and the Monday after St Nicholas' day. Fairs for horses, oxen, sheep, and cloth, are held on Holy Thursday, August 15th, September 21st, and October 2d.

The town has been incorporated from a remote period. It is now governed under a charter of Elizabeth, by a mayor, recorder, eight burgesses, and a number of freemen, with constables, sergeants-at-mace, &c. Within the borough the mayor and recorder act as justices of the peace. A court of pleas for any debts is held every third week, and sessions are held twice a-year. The petty-sessions for the eastern division of the hundred are held here monthly.

The borough returned two members to parliament from the 23d of Edward I. to the 2d William IV. The mayor and corporation, in all about 40 persons, alone possessed the franchise. One member is now returned, and the number of voters under the reform act is stated at 315. It is also one of the polling-places for the members for the eastern division of the county.

LIVERPOOL,

A borough, sea-port, and market-town, locally situated in the hundred of West Derby, co. palatine of Lancaster.

Population.—The population in 1700 was about 5000; in 1764, 26,000; in 1790, 56,000; in 1801, 77,653; in 1811, 94,376, exclusive of 7000 seamen; in 1821, 118,972; and in 1831, 165,175. A. P., £589,140.

History.—The origin of the name is involved in uncertainty. Some have derived it from a species of liver-wort found on the seashore; others, with greater appearance of correctness, have supposed that it took its name from a species of water-fowl, anciently called lever or liver, and bring the proof of its existence from the borough arms, the crest of which is a bird bearing that appellation. Others deduce it from its ancient orthography. In a charter of Henry II., it is said to be a place which the "Lyrrpul men call Litherpul." The latter part of the name was doubtless assumed from the circumstance of the town being situated on the borders of a pool, which occupied the site of the new eastern house, and flowed with the tide in the direction of Paradise-street. Baxter supposes this to have been the port of the Sstantii, mentioned by Ptolemy. This notion, however, has generally been rejected, and the existence of Liverpool even at the conquest is very doubtful. Doomsday-book proves that the extensive tract between the Ribble and Mersey was given by William I. to Roger of Poitiers, but no mention is made of Liverpool, unless we regard it as the Emedune or Luredune of that ancient record. There seems little reason to doubt that a castle was erected here by Roger de Poitiers, from which we may date the origin of the town. Morery asserts that the castle was built by King John, which seems to be supported by Leland, who says "the king hath a castelet there," but the authority of Camden outweighs these. Roger de Poitiers bestowed the wardenship of the castle on Vivian de Molyneux, whose descendants still enjoy estates in the neighbourhood. The castle was granted to the town in 1704, at a rent of £6 13s. 4d., and finally demolished in 1715, when St George's church was erected on its site. The conquest of Ireland gave the first stimulus to the commerce of Liverpool. In consequence of its relative situation to that country, it soon became a port of importance. Two charters of Henry I. are mentioned in the corporation records, but no such documents are to be found in the Owen-archives. A charter was granted by John, and, in 1229, renewed by Henry III., who, for a fine of ten marks, constituted it a free borough for ever, with a merchant-guild, and other liberties. In the beginning of the 16th century, Leland gives the following description of Liverpool:—" Lyrrpole, alias Lyceerpole, a pavid towne, hath but a chapel. Walton, at four milles off, not far from the Se, is Paroche Chirch. The king hath a castelet there, and the Erle of Darbe hath a stone-howe there. Irisch Marchauntes cum much thither, as to a good haven. After that Mersey water cumming toward Runcorne in Cheshire lieth among the commune people the name, and to Lyrrpole.—At Lyrrpole is smaule custome payd that causith Marchauntes to resort. Good Marchandis at Lyrrpole, and moch Irisch yarn that Manchester men do by ther." The town declined subsequent to this, containing, in 1565, only 138 houses, and, in 1571, being mentioned in a petition to Queen Elizabeth, as "her majesty's poor decayed town of Liverpool." In 1636, when Charles I. issued writs for the exaction of ship-money, Liverpool was rated at no more than £25, while Chester was charged £26, and Bristol £1000. In 1644, the town was in the hands of the parliament, and was besieged and taken the same year by Prince Rupert. It soon fell again into the possession of the parliament. In September, 1645, on a petition of the town, the parliament settled 'the milne and ferry-boats,' on the corporation, as a satisfaction for various losses. A great part of the town having been burnt, 500 tons of timber were allowed for rebuilding it; and it was ordered that the timber should be felled in the estates of the earl of Derby, Lord Molyneux, Sir W. Norris, and Robert Blundell, Robert Molyneux, Charles Gerard, and Edward Scarsbrick, Esqs. In addition to this, an ordinance was afterwards passed by both houses of parliament for confirming the charters and liberties of the town, and the sum of £10,000 was granted to indemnify the inhabitants for the losses they had sustained. The town was fortified during the civil wars, but the fortifications were afterwards dismantled, and considerable alarm was felt for its safety during the insurrections in favour of the Stuarts.

Trade.—The first accommodation for vessels afforded by Liverpool consisted in the erection of a mole, for the shelter of vessels in the winter season, and a quay for shipping and unshipping cargoes. In 1710, the first wet dock was formed on the site of the old pool or haven, which subsequently received the name of the Old dock, and was finally filled up in 1831. At this period, the number of vessels belonging to the port was 84, of the average size of 70 tons, and employing 924 seamen. But many vessels belonging to other places frequented this port. The principal trade was with Ireland, the isle of Man, and the northern states of Europe, independent of the coasting trade. At this period the extent of tonnage cleared out from Liverpool in British ships, was only 1-42 of that from all the ports in the kingdom. The West Indian and American trade gave a powerful stimulus to the port, and in 1716, the number of ships had increased to 113, navigated by 1376 seamen. The trade with Scotland for coarse cloths for the West India market was now interrupted by the competition of the Manchester manufacturers, who thus threw into the hands of Liverpool the monopoly of the supply of such goods to the West Indies. The trade appears to have risen most rapidly in wealth from the year 1722 to 1740, by means of a contraband trade with South America. This consisted in supplying Spanish smugglers with goods in Jamaica, where payment was made in specie. This branch of illicit commerce, which is said by Edwards to have vended to the amount of £1,500,000 in British goods annually, was checked by the vigilance of the Spanish government, and at length wholly abolished by act of parliament. The African trade was now partly in the hands of Liverpool, so that the suspension of the smuggling was not so severely felt as it might have been. In 1750, fifteen ships from Liverpool were employed in the slave trade with so much success, that they rapidly increased, and, in 1764, 74 ships cleared out for the coast of Africa. It has been estimated that the twelfth part of the shipping of Great Britain is navigated by Liverpool, that it has one-fourth of her foreign trade, one-sixth of her general commerce, and one-half of the trade of London. The present commerce of Liverpool may be divided into several branches. The trade with Ireland, which was the original support of the port, has increased from the employment of 15 vessels to upwards of 2,700. The export was chiefly British manufactures, salt and coal. Of the imports, the following statement for the year 1831, will convey a pretty accurate idea:

—Cows, 90,715; horses, 276; sheep, 134,726; mules, 243; pigs, 156,001; calves, 1,196; lambs, 25,725; hams and tongues, 590 hogsheads; bacon, 13,090 barrels; pork, 14,554 barrels, and 936 half-barrels; beef, 6,391 tierces, and 1199 barrels; lard, 465 tierces, and 4,542 firkins; butter, 5,754 cools, 258,087 firkins, and 19,217 half-firkins; eggs, 2,505 crates; wheat, 277,060 quarters; oats, 380,670 qrs.; barley, 21,323 qrs.; rye, 423 qrs.; beans, 8,452 qrs.; peas, 1,724 qrs.; malt, 6,850 qrs.; meal, 149,816 loads; flour, 93,154 sacks. The trade with the United States of America is another important branch of the commerce of Liverpool. The imports consist chiefly of cotton. The trade of Liverpool in this article is equal to six times the aggregate quantity imported into all other ports in the kingdom, and nine times greater than that imported into London. It is the mart for the re-exportation of the same material, after having passed through the hands of the manufacturers of Lancashire and the west of Scotland. In 1829, 641,373 bales of cotton were imported into Liverpool; 800 vessels cleared inwards, and 864 outwards on the American trade. Four packets sail every month for New York, 2 belonging to another company sail also for New York; 2 for Philadelphia, and one or two for Boston. With the West Indies, Liverpool carries on an extensive trade: in 1829, 195 vessels cleared inwards, and 233 outwards, on this trade. The imports in 1829 were 43,700 hogsheads and tierces of sugar; 11,650 puncheons of rum; 2,464 hogsheads of tobacco, of which the warehouses then contained 12,000 hogsheads, and 8,080 casks, with 5000 barrels and bags of coffee, including the exports of this article from other places. The trade with Africa employed in the same year about 80 vessels. Since 1814, this port has carried on considerable trade with the East Indies for cotton, sugar, indigo, and spices. In 1829, 68 ships were so employed. The trade with the Mediterranean, Baltic, British North America, and the various ports of Great Britain, is of great value and extent. The whole trade of the port, in 1829, may be understood from the following statement:—Of British vessels, there cleared outwards 1700, of foreign vessels 900; of British vessels there entered inwards 1485, and of foreign vessels 810, all engaged in foreign trade. The number of vessels connected with the port in that year was 11,214, the burden of which amounted to 1,411,964 tons. The gross receipt of customs in 1823 was £1,808,402, and in 1829, £3,123,758 8s. 10d. Liverpool possesses an extensive communication by steam with Ireland, Scotland, Wales, and various parts of the coast. In 1830 there were 16 steam-vessels plying to the ferries on the Mersey, 2 to the isle of Man, 3 to ports in the north of England, 6 to Wales, 7 to Scotland, and 36 to Ireland. The number of steam-vessels belonging to Liverpool has increased considerably since that period. In the article LANCASHIRE will be found an account of its inland connexions by canals, rivers, and railways.

Port.—The port of Liverpool is stated in an official paper, dated 28th November, 1723, to extend "from the Redstones in Hollyake, at the point of Wirral, southerly to the foot of the river called Ribble water, in a direct line northerly, and so upon the south side of the said river to Hesketh bank easterly, and to the rivers Asland and Douglas there, and so all along the sea coasts of Meols and Formby, unto the river Mersey, and all over the rivers Mersey, Irwell, and Weaver." At the entrance of the river is the Black rock lighthouse, with revolving lights alternately red and natural, and with a bell which is rung in hazy weather. It was erected in 1830. There is also a floating light 11 miles seawards, and pilot boats are constantly stationed there. There is also a telegraphic connexion with Holyhead.

Docks.—The docks are vested by an act of parliament, obtained in 1825, in 21 commissioners as trustees; of whom 13 are appointed by the incorporation, and the remainder by the rate payers, to the amount of £10 and upwards. To prevent inconvenience and disorder, the internal economy of each dock is superintended by a dock-master, whose annual salary is £105. There is also a harbour-master for the general superintendence of the port. Fires are not suffered on board the ships, nor were candles, unless secured in lanterns; the smoking of tobacco is forbidden under a penalty of 40s.; having combustible matter on the decks or quay during the night is punished by a penalty of £10; and having gunpowder on board while in dock, by a fine of 40s. As the docks are subject to accumulation of sand and mud, they have under-ground communications with each other by means of large tunnels, so that the water of one dock may be made to wash out another. This operation is usually performed once a year. When the dock to be cleaned is left dry by opening the gates when the tide is ebbing, and the sluices being opened in various directions, a number of men with spades throw the mud into the currents, which being thus carried away, the dock is sufficiently cleared in twelve or fourteen days. On the sides of the docks are warehouses of uncommon size and strength, to the different floors of which goods are craned up with great facility; while the space around the quays is sufficiently wide to prevent confusion or interruption where so much business is done. Very lately a dredging machine has been tried in the cleaning of the docks, and has been found to answer very well. The following are the wet docks:—1. The Salthouse dock. This was the second constructed in Liverpool, and contains an area of 23,025 square yards, with 759 lineal yards of quay. Its form is irregular: the upper end is chiefly occupied by ships that are laid up, the lower by corn and timber vessels.—2. St George's dock, constructed according to an act passed in the 2d George III. It was completed at an expense of £21,000, and contains an area of 26,793 square yards, with a length of quay equal to 1,001 yards. It is surrounded by extensive warehouses, and is chiefly resorted to by West India vessels. The gates are 36 feet wide, and 26 feet deep.—3. The king's dock, constructed in the 25th George III., is contiguous to the king's tobacco warehouse, and is consequently frequented by vessels from Virginia and other parts. The American vessels, and those in the Baltic trade, which freighted with timber and marine stores, likewise discharge their cargoes here. Its area is 37,776 square yards, and its length of quay 875 yards.—4. The queen's dock. This was constructed immediately after the last, at an expense of £25,000. It is chiefly occupied by American and Baltic vessels, and contains an area of 51,501 square yards; length of quay 1255 yards.—5. The duke's dock is a small basin belonging to the duke of Bridgewater, situated between the king's and Salthouse docks.—6. The prince's dock, opened on the day of the coronation of George IV., contains an area of 67,129 square yards, with 1613 yards of quay.—7. The dry dock between the Salthouse and George's docks is undergoing alterations, and will soon be a wet dock, with an area of 19,095 square yards, and 500 yards of quay.—8. The half-tide dock, which communicates with the southern end of Queen's dock, contains 13,185 square yards, and has 497 feet of quay.—9. The new North works consists of

The new south works are Brunswick dock, with 60,824 square yards, and 1092 yards of quay, and half-tide basin of 9,245 square yards, and 483 yards of quay. These measurements include the entrances to the several docks. Besides these there are the dry basins, from which the water disappears entirely on the ebbing of the tide. These are,—

Thus the whole dock-room includes a space of 111 acres, and the quay line extends to about eight miles. There are two lines of docks, communicating by passages; the south line consists of the Brunswick, Half-tide, Queen's, King's, and Duke's docks; the north line of the Salt-house, Dry, George's, Prince's, and New North docks. The river wall, exclusive of the openings, extends 2 m. 820 yards. Connected with these are numerous graving docks and private basins. In the year 1724, the dock dues amounted to £810 11s. 6d.; in 1752 to £1,776 8s. 2d.; in 1760, to £2,330 6s. 7d.; in 1770, to £4,142 17s. 2d.; in 1780, to £3,528 7s. 9d.; in 1790, to £10,037 6s. 2d.:

in 1800, to £23,379 13s. 6d.; in 1810, to £46,782 1s.; in 1829, to £166,550 11s. 11d.

Manufactures.—The manufactures of Liverpool are chiefly connected with ships, ship stores, and machinery of various kinds. The manufactures of soap, tobacco, and snuff, are very extensive. Liverpool is celebrated for the manufacture of watches and time-pieces, and supplies more than any town in the kingdom except London. Here are numerous houses for the refining of sugar, iron foundries, breweries, mills, marble-works, and potteries.

Situation and General Aspect.—Liverpool is situated on the eastern bank of the river Mersey, in 53° 22' N. lat. and 2° 30' W. long., at a distance of 204 m. from London. It extends from north to south about three miles, and about one mile from east to west. The streets are irregularly placed, and the houses are chiefly constructed of brick. In the vicinity of the river the streets are narrow, but to the east, where the ground rises in a gentle slope, they are spacious and elegant. Both coal and oil gas are used in lighting the streets, and excellent water is supplied in pipes distributed over every part of the town. The air is salubrious, and the temperature generally mild, in consequence of the vicinity of the sea. The mean temperature seems to be about 54°. It is generally supposed that, in proportion to the number of its inhabitants, Liverpool is one of the most healthy places in the kingdom.—“The situation of the town,” says Dr Dobson, “is peculiarly favourable to constitutions that require and can bear a cold sharp air; of which description are those of nervous relaxed habits, to whom, in most instances, it proves very friendly and favourable: the healthy will also have their health preserved by it. The occasions in which the situation of the town becomes unfavourable, are with those persons who are subject to coughs, asthma, and other affections of the chest; as those complaints are aggravated and renewed, and even promoted, in constitutions inclined.” The effect of the winds on the state of the weather are generally as follows:—The north-west winds are turbulent and stormy; the southern productive of rain; the easterly winds often accompany a serene sky; and the severest cold and frost usually come with a north or north-east wind.

Public Buildings.—On the site of the old dock is the New Custom-house, now in process of erection. It will be a superb structure in the Grecian style of architecture, and it is supposed that the expense will not be less than £300,000, of which government contributes £150,000.—The Town-hall is an elegant structure, at the north end of Castle-street. It was designed by Mr Wood of Bath, and founded in 1749. It has a well-proportioned rustic of basement, surmounted by an elegant range of columns and pilasters in the Corinthian style, between which are the windows, having circular heads supported by small Corinthian pilasters. Between the capitals of the columns are tablets, containing emblematical bas-reliefs. A handsome portico, with a plain bold pediment, has been added to the original structure, in front. The light Corinthian dome is likewise a recent addition, the former having been thought not to harmonise with the rest of the building. In 1796, the whole interior was destroyed by fire, and was renewed on an improved plan at an expense of £60,000. The basement now contains a kitchen with appropriate offices; the ground story, a committee-room, rooms for the magistrates and juries, general sessions room, rotation office, and offices for the town-clerk, treasurer, surveyor, &c. The rooms on the principal floor communicate with each other; they are—a saloon, 30 feet by 26; a drawing-room, 33 feet by 26; a ball-room, 90 feet by 42; a second ball-room, 66 feet by 30; a card-room, 33 feet by 26; a tea-room, 33 feet by 22; and an eating-room, 50 feet by 30. The last-mentioned room has a richly pannelled arched ceiling, and the sides are ornamented with pilasters of artificial marble, so well imitated, that they are generally described as formed of the marble of Carniola. These pilasters are in the Corinthian style, and are divided by niches, adapted for statues. A superb chandelier of crystal hangs from the centre of the roof. The grand dome lights the stair-case. The height from the ground to the top of the dome is nearly 120 feet, and all the ornaments are in the purest taste. The inside is illuminated by spacious lateral lights, from which circumstance it happens that there is none of that gloomy and sombre appearance which often strikes the eye in the cupolas of great buildings. On the outside of the dome is a circular gallery, from whence may be obtained a fine view of the town. This suite of rooms is appropriated to the use of the chief magistrate, during his mayoralty.

The new Exchange buildings were founded under the superintendence of John Foster, Esq., in 1803, and occupied in their erection a period of 3½ years. The expense was defrayed by subscription, and amounted to nearly £100,000. The stone was obtained from quarries belonging to the earl of Sefton, in Toxteth park, near Liverpool. The buildings form three sides of a square, the fourth of which is occupied by the northern side of the town-hall. The area extends from N. to S. 197 feet, and from E. to W. 178 feet; it therefore contains 35,066 square feet. The facades of the east and west sides are uniform, measuring 131 feet 2½ inches along the plinth, and 55 feet 9 inches from the ground to the top of the balustrade. They consist of a rustic basement, supporting Corinthian columns and pilasters, the whole being surrounded by a balustrade. The inside north front is of the same character, with a projection in the centre to match the town-hall. This forms a magnificent portico, supported by eight Corinthian columns 25 feet in height, each formed of a single block of stone. Above the entablature are four statues of Portland stone. There is likewise a grand entrance from Old Hall-street. It is formed by three open arches in the rustic basement, leading to a spacious vestibule. This is divided into three spaces by Doric pillars, each 12 feet 6 inches high, and supporting groined arches. Above the entrance are four Doric pilasters supporting a pediment. The three inside fronts have each a fine piazza, 15 feet wide, intended for the shelter of the merchants during bad weather. The east wing contains a news-room, 94 feet in length by 51 in width. The architecture is of the Ionic order, and the ceiling is supported by 16 columns, each formed of a single block of stone. The room is thus divided into a nave and two aisles, the roof of the former being raised and ornamented. The walls are ornamented with pilasters to correspond to the pillars. It is lighted by six large arched windows on the east side, five—with a door—on the west, and two smaller windows at the south end. Immediately over this is the underwriters' room, which is 72 feet by 36. The ceiling is lofty and carved, and it is lighted by eight windows. The room is fitted up with boxes for the accommodation of persons transacting business there, and it is conducted on the principle of that at Lloyd's in London. There is a plentiful supply of newspapers, lists, intelligence, &c. The front and west wing of the building, with part of the east wing, contain a number of elegant and commodious counting-houses, and the back is formed into spacious warehouses. In the area formed by the exchange buildings and the town-hall, the merchants daily congregate for the transaction business. In the centre of the area is a wretchedly designed monument to Nelson.

The old Custom-house is a plain structure, on the side of the Old Dock. The Dock-office adjoins it.

The old Tobacco-warehouse stands on the side of the King's dock. It was erected by the corporation, and rented by government; it is constructed of brick, and is capable of containing 4000 hogsheads of tobacco. The use of this has recently been superseded by the erection of a new range of warehouses on the west side of the dock. This is a plain structure, and contains an area of $3\frac{1}{4}$ acres.

The Corn-exchange in Brunswick-street, is a plain structure in the Grecian style, erected on the plan of that in Mark-lane, London. It was founded in 1807, the expense, which amounted to £10,000, having been defrayed by subscription. The front is of stone.

Libraries, &c.—The Athenæum was founded in 1799; it consists of a neat stone building in Church-street, containing both a library and a news-room. The building cost £4000, and the annual subscription by each of 500 proprietors is £2 12s. 6d. The library now contains upwards of 14,000 volumes, which are only read in the library. Each shareholder has the right of nominating one young man between the ages of 16 and 23, to read in the library. The collection of books is judicious and valuable.—A medical library, and a law library, have recently been founded in Liverpool for the use of the members of the respective professions.—The Lyceum is a handsome structure in Bold-street, erected in 1802, under the direction of Mr Harrison of Chester, at an expense of £11,000, raised by subscription.

It contains a reading and news-room, the annual subscription to which is £2 6s. by each of 800 proprietors. The library, which is used by 893 proprietors, at a subscription of 10s. 6d. annually, contains nearly 30,000 volumes, which circulate among the proprietors. The library is circular, and lighted from the top by a dome-light. There is also a lecture-room.—The Union news-room is a plain structure, erected after the designs of Mr Foster, in Duke-street. It was erected in 1800, at an expense of nearly £6,000. It has a reading-room, 46 feet by 49; above, is another room, originally intended for the reception of a library, but used only for occasional exhibitions of paintings.—The Royal Liverpool institution was founded in 1804, and incorporated by royal charter in 1820. The building was erected at an expense of £14,000, and contains school and lecture-rooms, reading-room, library, committee-rooms, exhibition and society rooms, laboratory and chemical class-room. Connected with this institution are lecturers on anatomy, chemistry, botany, physiology, astronomy, and teachers of languages, mathematics, composition, and drawing. The museum is very rich.—Near Edgehill is a remarkably fine Botanic garden, containing an extensive conservatory. It was founded by subscription in 1803, and has increased with great rapidity.

Public Amusements, &c.—The Theatre is on the east side of Williamson-square, and was erected in 1772, at an expense of £6,000. It is open from May till December, and is very well constructed. Here are also an amphitheatre and circus for equestrian exhibitions.—The Wellington-rooms in Mount Pleasant, were founded in 1815, after a design of Mr Edmund Alkin of London. The stone front is in the Corinthian style of architecture. The interior consists of an extensive suite of assembly rooms, with the usual accommodations of card-room, supper-room, &c. A musical festival is held triennially in Liverpool, at which concerts and oratorios take place, and the first performers in the kingdom are engaged. Lancashire is celebrated for its chorus singers.—The public baths—a range of light handsome stone buildings—are situated at the end of the North quay, and were purchased some years ago by the corporation for £4000. Nearly opposite this are moored the floating baths, launched in 1816. Both present excellent accommodations. Races take place in July, and are held at Aintree, about 6 m. N.E. from the town.

Markets.—Wednesday and Saturday are market-days, but markets for provisions are held every lawful day. They are very well supplied with every article, more especially with fish and vegetables. An extensive market-house was erected in 1820, at an expense of £35,000, in the centre of the town. There are also markets in James-street, Cleveland-square, Scotland-road, &c. Fairs are held on July 25th, and November 11th.

Government.—Liverpool is governed under a charter granted by King John, with various modifications received from many succeeding monarchs. The body-corporate consists of 41 persons, from whom a mayor, recorder, and two bailiffs are chosen annually. Those who have borne the office of mayor, are styled aldermen. The mayor, preceding mayor, five senior aldermen, and recorder, are justices of the peace. The bailiffs and three junior aldermen are coroners. The right of electing the body-corporate belongs to the free burgesses, who inherit, or acquire by gift or servitude, the freedom of the town, being likewise free of Bristol, Waterford, and Wexford. The right of electors, however, has long been dormant here. The mayor and bailiffs are chosen annually on the 18th October, or St Luke's day. The ancient custom of riding round the liberties of the town is observed on the Monday but one preceding the election. The mayor or an alderman attends daily at the town-hall for the transaction of business. The corporation hold courts of quarter-session, courts of record, and courts of requests, for offences not capital, and the recovery of debts.

The town has returned two members to parliament regularly since the reign of Edward VI. The freemen of the town, in number about 5000, still retain their right of election, with the addition of holders of houses, &c. of the rent of £10 per annum and upwards. The number of electors is now nearly 18,000. The corporation possesses funds, chiefly derived from the dock dues, to the annual value of upwards of £100,000, which is expended on town improvements, charities, &c. The leases granted by the corporation are for three lives, and a term of 21 years after the death of the survivor; a large portion of the revenue arises from the fines paid for the renewal of such leases. The police of the town and docks is arranged with great judgment. Here are a goal, capable of containing upwards of 600 prisoners; a house of correction for 800; and the house of correction for the hundred of West Derby, capable of containing 550.

Ecclesiastical Affairs.—Liverpool, in the times of Leland, was a chapelry to Walton. It was not till the 10th William III., that an act was passed declaring, that from the 24th June, 1699, the town and liberties of Liverpool should be a distinct parish of itself, separate from Walton; the living to be a rectory, in two mediocres, in the archd. and dio. of Chester; the patronage being vested in the mayor and corporation. The old parochial chapel was now called the church of St Nicholas, and a new church was erected, ded. to St Peter. St Nicholas' church was erected in 1774, on the base of the ancient structure. It is a neat Gothic structure. The tower and spire were erected in 1810, the old one having fallen on the 11th of February in that year, during the ringing of the bells. Twenty-eight persons were killed, and it is fortunate that the accident took place no later, for had the congregation been assembled many more lives must have been lost. Almost the whole pews in the centre of the church were either entirely demolished or much injured, and the west gallery and organ were completely destroyed. At the dissolution there were four chantries in the chapel of Liverpool. The king's rent at the dissolution was £10 ls. 4d.—St Peter's church was begun in 1699, and consecrated in 1704. It is a plain structure, and contains some curious carvings in oak. In the town are the following perpetual curacies, in the patronage of the corporation: St George's, St Thomas', St Paul's, St Anne's, St John's, St Michael's, St Luke's, and St Martin's. The following will fall into the hands of the corporation after certain terms: The Holy Trinity; patron, the Rev. R. Formby.—Christ church; patron, E. Gibbon, Esq.—St Mark's; patron, John Whithy, Esq.—St Andrew's; patron, John Gladstone, Esq.—St Philip's; patron, John Cragge, Esq.—St David's; in the patronage of trustees.—St Catherine's and St Bride's are in process of erection by subscription. The rectors will possess the patronage of the following: St Stephen's; patron, W. S. Miller, Esq.—St Matthew's; patron, J. T. Holloway, Esq.—St Mary's; in the patronage of trustees. There is a floating chapel for seamen. The Baptists have five places of worship; the Welsh Calvinists, three; the Society of Friends, one; the Independents, five; the Methodists, seven; the Sandemanians and Swedenborgians, each one; the Unitarians, two. There are two Scottish kirks, two Secession chapels, five Roman Catholic chapels, and a synagogue.

Charitable Establishments.—An infirmary was erected here in 1745, but having been found too small, and inconveniently situated, a new infirmary was founded in 1824, the expense being defrayed by public subscription. The annual expenditure exceeds £5,000, and affords accommodation to 234 patients, who are admitted on the recommendation of a subscriber. The medical attendants perform their duties gratuitously. The seamen's hospital is a charity intended for the support of decayed seamen of this port, and of their widows and children. It is supported partly by the monthly contribution of sixpence, which every seaman, sailing from this port, is obliged by act of parliament to pay out of his wages. It has likewise a capital stock of £35,000, unclaimed prize-money. About 700 persons receive aid from this excellent institution. A building was erected in 1752 on the ground belonging to the infirmary, at the expense of £1500. There are two excellent dispensaries, an infirmary for diseases of the eye, and another for diseases of the ear. There is a well conducted lunatic asylum founded in 1796, but rebuilt and extended in 1830. Another lunatic asylum has been erected contiguous to the infirmary. The house of recovery is intended for receiving persons affected with fevers, and thus preventing, so far as possible, the spreading of such disorders through the town. The institution for restoring drowned persons, or humane society, was established in 1776, and has proved of high utility. The ladies' charity was established in 1796 for the purpose of affording medical aid, and various necessities to poor married women in their own houses. The expenditure exceeds £1000 per annum, and the number of persons who have benefited by it exceeds 60,000. The house of industry was erected at an expense of £8000, and can accommodate 400 persons, who are employed in various works according to their ability. The almshouses are situated near the house of Industry. The female penitentiary is in Falkner-street, and is well supported. The committee for the relief of debtors, confined in the borough gaol, was instituted in 1810, and is enabled to carry its object into effect by liberal subscriptions. The female school of industry was begun in 1809. One hundred young females are educated here. Their expenses are paid out of their earnings, a part of which also goes into a general fund, from which small annuities are paid to each on attaining the age of 55. The strangers' Friend's society was founded, and is chiefly supported by Methodists, but its benefits are extended equally to persons of all denominations. The school for the indigent blind was established in 1791, and is situate in London road, corner of Duncan-street. The principal occupations of the pupils are spinning; hamper and basket-making; plaiting of sash-line; weaving of floor-cloth and socking; the manufacture of worsted, hearth-rugs, and of foot-bears, points and gaskets, from old ropes; and the learning of music. In this last department, the attention of the committee is principally directed to qualify the pupils for organists, and several have obtained situations of this kind, while others find employment in teaching music. About 120 pupils are now in the school, and the produce of their labour brings about £1500, or £2000 per annum. An institution for the deaf and dumb was founded in 1825. The blue-coat school was established in 1709, and is well-endowed: 250 boys and 100 girls receive maintenance, clothes, and education here. All the children are in school the whole day, and are taught on Dr Bell's system. They are admitted into the hospital at the age of 8 years, and apprenticed at 14. The corporation have founded two schools for poor children; one in Park-lane at an expense of £12,000, and another at Bevington-hill. In these 800 boys and 600 girls are educated. Besides these charities are,—The Moorfields Sunday and daily charity school for 300 children.—The Hunter-street charity school for 120 boys and 140 girls.—The St James' school for 174 boys.—St Matthew's Sunday school.—The Renshaw-street day and Sunday school, supported by subscription.—The Manesty-lane day and Sunday charity school for 70 boys and 49 girls.—The Circus-street day and Sunday schools for 1050 scholars.—The Caledonian, Brunswick, and St Andrew's schools, in which 575 children are taught to read and write.—The Welch charitable society.—St Mark's school.—The Harrington school.—The marine school for the instruction of poor sailor boys in the evenings.—The Bethesda day and Sunday schools, and a number of Sunday schools in various quarters of the town, some of which are for the instruction of adults. The mechanics' institution is one of the best conducted in the kingdom." Among the eminent natives of Liverpool may be mentioned Dean the sculptor, Stubbs the animal painter, Jeremiah Horrox, an eminent astronomer; Dr Dobson, Dr Bostock, Mrs Hemans, Dr Enfield, Wm. Roscoe, Esq., and the Rev. Leigh Richmond. The family of Jenkinson has the title of earl from Liverpool.

The church is a spacious cruciform structure dedicated to St Publicus. The parish has on the Menai straits, and contains an area of 2000 acres. See CARNARVON.

LLANBEDDERY, a hamlet in the parish of Llan-Carfan, hundred of Dinas-Powis, co. of Glamorgan, South Wales.

LLANBEDR, a parish in the hundred of Crickhowel, co. of Brecon, South Wales. Living, a rectory with the curacy of Partrishow, in the archd. of Brecon and dio. of St David's, rated at £16 17s. 6d., and in the patronage of the duke of Beaufort. The tower of the church belongs to an ancient structure erected in the 11th century. Here is an endowment of £13 per annum for the relief of aged housekeepers, and education of poor girls. The parish is crossed by the greater and less Grwyney rivers, and lies in a picturesque valley. It lies N.E. from Crickhowel. Pop., in 1801, 309; in 1831, 359. A. P., £1,849.

LLANBEDR, a parish in the hundred of Ardwy, co. of Merioneth, North Wales. Living, a perpetual curacy, not in charge, in the archd. and dio. of Bangor, and annexed to the vicarage of Llandanwg. The parish lies on the Arthro, and extends 7 m. by 4 m. It is crossed by the county road from Harleigh to Barmouth. Distance from Barmouth, 7 m. N. Pop., in 1801, 319; in 1831, 403.

LLANBEDR, a chapel in the parish of Llanmartin, co. of Monmouth. Living, a curacy in the archd. and dio. of Llandaff, rated at £6 11s. 5½d., and in the patronage of the archdeacon and chapter of Llandaff. The chapel was ded. to St Peter, but is now in ruins. Distance from Caerleon, 4 m. E.

LLANBEDR, a parish in the hundred of Pain's-Castle, co. of Radnor, South Wales. Living, a perpetual curacy in the archd. of Cardigan and dio. of St David's, rated at £8, returned at £50, and in the patronage of the prebend of Boughrood. The parish lies between the river Machawy and Llyn-Llanbychllyn, and contains 3000 acres. Distance from Hay, 6 m. N.W. Pop., in 1801, 78; in 1831, 356. A. P., £1,548.

LLANBEDR-DYFFRYN-CLWYD, a parish in the hundred of Rhuthyn, co. of Denbigh, North Wales. Living, a rectory in the archd. and dio. of Bangor, rated at £13 1s. 8d., and in the patronage of the bishop of Bangor. The parish lies on the high road from Rhuthyn to Mold. Distance from Rhuthyn, 1 m. N.E. Pop., in 1801, 422; in 1831, 527. A. P., £2,747.

LLANBEDR-FELFREY, or LAMPETER-FELFREY, a parish in the hundred of Narbeth, co. of Pembroke, South Wales. Living, a rectory in the archd. and dio. of St David's, rated at £10, and in the patronage of the crown. The parish lies on the river Marles, and includes an area of 8000 acres. Distance from Narbeth, 3 m. S.E. Pop., in 1801, 705; in 1831, 984. A. P., £4,694.

LLANBEDR-GOCH, a parish in the hundred of Tyndaethwy, co. of Anglesea, North Wales. Living, a curacy, not in charge, in the archd. and dio. of Bangor, annexed to the rectory of Llanddyffnan, and in the patronage of the bishop of Bangor. Limestone is found here in abundance and exported. The parish lies on Red-Wharf bay and extends over 1800 acres. Distance from Beaumaris, 7½ m. N.W. Pop., in 1801, 312; in 1831, 437. A. P., £663.

LLANBEDR, or LAMPETER-PONT-STEPHEN, a market-town and borough in the hundreds of Moeddyn and Troedyraur, co. of Cardigan, South Wales. It has generally a respectable aspect, and contains a market-house, excellent inn, house of correction, and two dissenting meeting-houses. Living, a discharged vicarage in the archd. and dio. of St David's, rated at £6 18s. 4d., and in the patronage of the bishop of St David's. Two-thirds of the rectorial tithes are impropriated by the precentor of St David's. Saturday is market-day, and fairs are held on January 11th, March 6th, May 11th, Wednesday in Whitsun-week, July 10th, 1st Saturday in August, 1st Saturday in September, September 26th, October 19th, and 1st Saturday in November, all in old style. Here is a lead mine belonging to Lord Carrington. Quarter-sessions are regularly held here. The town is governed by a portreeve, chosen annually at a court-leet held by the lord of the manor. It is a borough, and unites with Cardigan, Aberystwith, and Adpar, in returning one member to parliament. It is also a polling-place for the county member.—Here are an unendowed grammar school, and a national school, in which about 100 poor children receive education. A college, dedicated to St David, was founded here in 1822, by Bishop Burgess, and was opened in 1827. The building stands on an eminence and has a picturesque aspect, being seen from a considerable distance in the flat country. The college is incorporated by royal charter, and the students, like those of St Bee's and Cowbridge, have the privilege of direct admission into holy orders. About 100 scholars are educated here, under a principal, and professors of Hebrew, Welsh, Mathematics, and Natural Philosophy. The natives of Wales are preferred as scholars. It is supposed that in ancient times this town was more extensive and more thickly peopled than at present. Here were other churches, and a priory, and in the vicinity are some traces of Roman and British forts. Distance from London, 209 m. W. by N. Pop., in 1801, 1037; in 1831, 1317. A. P., £3,900.

LLANBEDR-Y-CENNIN, a parish in the hundred of Isaf, co. of Carnarvon, North Wales. Living, a rectory with the vicarage of Caerhun, in the archd. and dio. of Bangor, rated at £6 19s. 4d., and in the patronage of the bishop of Bangor. Church ded. to St Peter. The village stands on a hill on the north side of the vale of Conway, close to the river Conway. A fair is held on the 3d of October, at which many Welsh ponies are brought to sale. Distance from Llanrwst, 6 m. N. by W. Pop., in 1801, 420; in 1831, 476. A. P., £1,556.

LLANBERRIS, or LLANPERIS, a parish in the hundred of Is-Gwyrfa, co. of Carnarvon, North Wales. Living, a discharged rectory in the archd. and dio. of Bangor, rated at £4 18s. 9d., and returned at £105. Here are extensive mines of copper and slate quarries. The parish includes the gloomy valley called the Pass of Llanberis, and a new village has sprung up, principally supported by tourists, who resort to this as the finest scenery in Wales. The surrounding mountains are lofty and rugged, and in the bosom of the valley are small but romantic lakes, one of which is fed by the river Afon Hwch, which forms in one place a sublime cataract of 60 feet in height. The pass is bounded on the east by the Glider-Fawr mountain, and on the west by Snowdon. A line of road was carried along the margin of the lower lake to Carnarvon, and in 1831, it was continued through the pass of Llanberis, to the post road from Beddgelert to Capel-Curig. In the middle of the pass is the ancient castle of Dolbadern, which adds greatly to the romantic appearance of the place. For upwards of 20 years this castle was the prison of Owen Goch, brother of Llewellyn, the last prince of Wales. The mineral products of the parish are conveyed in flats along the lake, after which a railway carries them to Moel-y-Don, on the Menai strait, where they are shipped for exportation. Distance from Carnarvon, 10 m. E. Pop., in 1801, 464; in 1831, 725. A. P., £1,036.

LLANBEUDY, a parish in the hundred of Deryly, co. of Carmarthen, South Wales. Living, a discharged vicarage in the archd. of Carmarthen and dio. of St David's, rated at £8, returned at £59 14s. 8d., and in 1829, in the patronage of Mr Bludworth. The prebend of Llanbeudy is inappropriate, rated at £16, and in the patronage of the bishop of St David's. The parish lies at the base of the mountain of Llanvernach, and includes an area of 21 square miles. Distance from Narbeth, 6 m. N.E. Pop., in 1801, 1349; in 1831, 1820. A. P., £5,740.

LLANBEULAN, a parish in the hundreds of Llyfon and Malldraeth, co. of Anglesea, North Wales. It includes five chapelries. Living, a rectory in the archd. and dio. of Bangor, rated at £22 3s. 11½d. The erection of the church is referred to the year 630. Here is a Druidical cromlech, to which has been given the name of Arthur's quoit. Distance from Holyhead, 10 m. S.E. Pop., in 1801, 140; in 1831, 375. A. P., £1,651.

LLANBISTER, a parish in the hundred of Knighton, co. of Radnor, South Wales. It includes seven townships and is divided into Upper and Lower Llanbister. Living, a discharged vicarage in the archd. of Cardigan and dio. of St David's, rated at £6 11s. 5½d., and in the patronage of the bishop of St David's. The prebend of Llanbister is rated at £34, and belongs to the chancellor of the collegiate church of Brecon. The parish extends over 30,000 acres of land, and lies in a mountainous district between the rivers Tame and Ithon. Here is a school with a small endowment. Here was anciently an abbey, long ago demolished entirely. Here are some mineral springs. Distance from Knighton, 9 m. W.N.W. Pop., in 1801, 940; in 1831, 1508. A. P., £5,004.

LLANBLEIDDIAN, a parish in the hundreds of Cowbridge and Ogmere, co. of Glamorgan, South Wales. Living, a discharged vicarage in the archd. and dio. of Llandaff, rated at £10

3s. 4d., and in the patronage of the dean and chapter of Gloucester. The church is a handsome old structure. The parish lies in a sheltered valley on the banks of the river Cowbridge, and contains about 3000 acres. Here are picturesque ruins of an ancient castle, the principal gateway being the most perfect portion. It was given to the family of St Quintin, on the partition of Glamorganshire, but by whom it was erected is not known. It afterwards became the property of Lord Windsor. Distance from Cowbridge, ½ m. S.W. Pop., in 1801, 475; in 1831, 670. A. P., £4,049.

LLAN-BRYNN-MAIR, a parish in the hundred of Machynnllaeth, co. of Montgomery, North Wales. Living, a vicarage in the archd. and dio. of St Asaph, rated at £4 8s. 1½d., and in the patronage of the bishop of St Asaph. There is likewise a sinecure rectory, not in charge. The parish is divided into Upper and Lower divisions, and contains 20 square miles, chiefly hill and pasture land, on which numerous sheep and black cattle are fed. It is watered by a rivulet which flows into the Dyfl. Here is the cataract of Frwydafawr, which is 150 feet in height. Fairs are held here on the Friday before the first fair in Welsh Pool, May 31st, September 16th, and November 25th. Distance from Machynnllaeth, 10 m. E. Pop., in 1801, 1743; in 1831, 2040. A. P., £5,649.

LLAN-CADOG. See AMLWCH.

LLAN-CADWALADYR, a parish in the hundred of Chirk, co. of Denbigh, North Wales. Living, a curacy in the archd. and dio. of St Asaph, not in charge, returned at £72 6s., and subordinate to the vicarage of Llan-Rhaiadar. The parish lies in an elevated site, among the Llanarmon mountains. Distance from Oswestry, 8 m. W. Pop., in 1801, 136; in 1831, 205. A. P., £746.

LLAN-CARFAN (EAST and WEST), a parish in the hundred of Dinas-Powis, co. of Glamorgan, South Wales. Living, a discharged vicarage in the archd. and dio. of Llandaff, rated at £8 13s. 9d., and in the patronage of the dean and chapter of Gloucester. The church is a spacious structure. The parish lies in the vale of Glamorgan, not far from the Bristol channel, and extends over 4000 acres, chiefly arable. It contains 8 hamlets and the extra-parochial district of Llan-Oethin. St Cadocus founded an abbey here, in 500, the site of which is yet pointed out. This was the birth-place of the celebrated Welsh historian Caradoc. Distance from Cowbridge, 4 m. S.E. Pop., in 1801, 631; in 1831, 734. A. P., £5,053.

LLANCILLOE, a parish in the hundred of Ewyras-Lacy, co. of Hereford. LLANDAFF, a parish in the hundred of Kibbor, co. of Glamorgan, South Wales. It comprises the city of the same name, the seat of the bishopric of Llandaff, which is merely an insignificant village, situated on the banks of the river Taff. The market has fallen into disuse; but vegetables, the produce of the neighbourhood, are sold in abundance for the supply of the towns in the vicinity. Fairs for black cattle are held on February 9th, and Whit-Monday. The magistrates of the county meet here to hold petty-sessions for the hundred of Kibbor. The living is a vicarage, in the archd. and dio. of Llandaff, not in charge, held by a senior and junior vicar who receive respectively the sums of £61 16s. 8d. and £39 6s. 8d., yearly, and in the patronage of the dean and chapter of Llandaff. The foundation of a church here is said to have taken place immediately on the introduction of Christianity into Britain.—The bishopric was founded in the fifth century, and the names of the bishops from that period, up to the 9th, have been preserved. The greater part of the counties of Glamorgan and Merioneth belongs to this see. The possessions of the cathedral were anciently much greater, but at the Conquest they were reduced considerably. The fines yield £50 per annum to each member of the chapter, and the tithes of Llandaff and Whitechurch, yielding £480 per annum, belongs to the treasurer, precentor, and prebendaries. Besides, various livings are impropriated for the support of the bishop and others. The chapter consists of the bishop, who holds also the offices of dean and treasurer, an archdeacon, a chancellor, preceptor, and nine prebendaries. The choral service has been discontinued and the cathedral is now little more than a parochial church. The ancient church was destroyed at the conquest. It was rebuilt by bishop Urban, in 1120, chiefly in the Norman style. This building has fallen partly into ruins and is partly covered by modern additions, but some very fine specimens of ancient architecture are yet visible. It contains some fine old monuments. Here were anciently an episcopal palace and castle, which were destroyed by the troops of Owen Glendower. Distance from London, 163 m. W. Pop., in 1801, 860; in 1831, 1299. A. P., £2,042.

LLANDANWG, a parish in the hundred of Arddwy, co. of Merioneth, North Wales. Living, a discharged vicarage, with the curacy of Llanbedr, in the archd. and dio. of Bangor, rated at £7 15s. 1½d., returned at £137 10s. 4d., and in the patronage of the bishop of Bangor. The parish lies in a sequestered situation on the estuary of the Biehan, at the mouth of the river Artro, in a rugged and hilly district. Here is a free school with an endowment of £10 per annum. The parish is crossed by the coast road from Harleigh to Barmouth. Distance from Harleigh, 3 m. S. Pop., in 1801, 461; in 1831, 658. A. P., £1,251.

LLAN-DAUDDWR, a parish in the hundred of Derllys, co. of Carmarthen, South Wales. Living, a discharged rectory in the archd. of Carmarthen and dio. of St David's, rated at £6, and, in 1829, in the patronage of Lord Milford. The parish, which contains 1200 acres, lies at the confluence of the rivers Cojer and Taff. Distance from Llaacharn, 3 m. W.N.W. Pop., in 1801, 216; in 1831, 420. A. P., £818.

LLAN-DAUG, a parish in the hundred of Derllys, co. of Carmarthen, South Wales. Living, a rectory in the archd. of Carmarthen and dio. of St David's, rated at £17 10s., returned at £32, annexed to the rectory of Pendynn, and in the patronage of Mr Powel. The parish, which contains 800 acres, lies on the high road from Llaugharn and Narbeth. Pop., in 1801, 24; in 1831, 19. A. P., £390.

LLANDAVENNY, a hamlet in the parish of St Bride's, and lower division of the hundred of Caldicot, co. of Monmouth.

LLANDDAROG, a parish in the hundred of Is-Cenen, co. of Carmarthen, South Wales. Living, a vicarage in the archd. of Carmarthen and dio. of St David's, valued at £8, and in the patronage of the bishop of St David's. The prebend of Llanddarog, which is also in the patronage of the bishop, is in the collegiate church of Brecon, and is rated at £10, returned at £40 16s. The parish lies on the river Gwendraeth-Fach, and contains 3500 acres. Here is a ruined chapel. Distance from Carmarthen, 6½ m. E. by S. Pop., in 1801, 690; in 1831, 1037. A. P., £3,029.

LLANDDAUSAINT, or LLANDOYSAINT, a parish in the hundred of Perfedd, co. of Carmarthen, South Wales. Living, a donative in the archd. of Carmarthen and dio. of St David's, not in charge, annexed to the vicarage of Llangaddog, and in the patronage of the bishop of St David's. The parish contains 8000 acres, and the hamlets of Llandoysaint, Bluen-Sawddy, and Maes-y-Ffynon. It lies in an elevated situation on the Black mountains, at the source of the river Usk. A fair is held, 20th October. Distance from Llangaddog, 6 m. S.E. Pop., in 1801, 682; in 1831, 1006. A. P., £2,367.

LLANDDEINIOL, or CARROG, a parish in the hundred of Ilar, co. of Cardigan, South Wales. Living, a perpetual curacy in the archd. of Cardigan, and dio. of St David's, rated at £6, returned at £48 7s., and in the patronage of Mr Price. The impropriate rectory, which was formerly a prebend in the church of Llan-Ddewi-Brefi, rated at £48 7s. The parish lies on the bay of Cardigan. Distance from Aberystwith, 7½ m. S.W. Pop., in 1801, 215; in 1831, 254. A. P., £650.

LLANDDEINIOL-FAB, or LLANDDANIEL, a parish in the hundred of Menai, co. of Anglesea, North Wales. Living, a curacy, not in charge, in the patronage of Lord Boston, and annexed to the vicarage of Llanidan. It lies on the banks of the little river Braint, and extends over 1800 acres of land. Pop., in 1801, 390; in 1831, 372. A. P., £1,391.

LLANDETTY, a parish in the hundred of Pen-Celli, co. of Brecon, South Wales. Living, a rectory in the archd. of Brecon and dio. of St David's, rated at £7 10s. 7½d., and in the patronage of the family of Gwynne, of Buckland. The patronage of this living has passed through the hands of many families, as the various lords of Pen-Celli, the De Breos, Mortimers, and Staffords, the Vaughans of Bredwardine and others. Subordinate to this living is the curacy of Taffechan, of which the rector is patron. The school has a small endowment. The northern side of the parish is watered by the river Usk, and crossed by the Brecon canal. Distance from Brecon, 10 m. S.E. Pop., in 1801, 479; in 1831, 579. A. P., £1,153.

LLANDEW, LLANDEWI, a parish in the hundreds of Merthyr and Pen-Celli, co. of Brecon, South Wales. The name signifies the church of St David's. Living, a perpetual curacy, rated at £6, returned at £42 5s., and in the archd. and dio. of St David's. The great tithes are impropriated by the archd. of Brecon. The bishop of St David's had formerly a palace here, which is described by Leland, and he still holds a court-leet occasionally for the manor. The courts-baron have been discontinued. The church is a spacious structure of great antiquity. The manor belongs to the see of St David's, and was sold during the commonwealth, but restored at the restoration. The river Honddu passes the village, which stands in a very retired situation. Distance from Brecon, 1 m. N.E. Pop., in 1801, 174; in 1831, 323. A. P., £1,538.

LLANDEWI, a parish in the hundred of Swansea, co. of Glamorgan, South Wales. Living, a discharged vicarage in the archd. and dio. of Llandaff, rated at £3 3s. 4d., returned at £55 5s., and in the patronage of the bishop of St David's, to whom the rectorial tithes belong. The parish is crossed by the road from Swansea to Penrice, and contains 1200 acres. Distance from Penrice, 5 m. N. Pop., in 1801, 126; in 1831, 150. A. P., £864.

LLANDEWI-ABERARTH, a parish in the hundred of Ilar, co. of Cardigan, South Wales. It includes the villages of Llanddewi-Aberarth, and Aberaeron. Living, a perpetual curacy, rated at £6, returned at £60 11s. 4d., in the archd. of Cardigan and dio. of St David's, and in the patronage of the Barker family. The rectorial tithes form the endowment of a prebend in the cathedral of St David's, and is rated at £10. The parish lies upon Cardigan bay, at the mouth of the river Arth, where there is a small harbour, the entrance to which is obstructed by a bar. It is crossed by the coast road from Aberystwith to Cardigan. Fairs are held here on July 5th, and December 11th. Distance from Lampeter, 13 m. N.W. Pop., in 1801, 656; in 1831, 976. A. P., £1,440.

LLANDEWI-ABER-GWESIN, a parish in the hundred of Buallt, co. of Brecon, South Wales. Living, a curacy in the archd. of Brecon and dio. of St David's, not in charge, returned at £24 16s. 8d., in the patronage of the bishop of St David's, and annexed to the vicarage of Llan-Gammarch. This is the wildest and most uncultivated district in the county, situated in the vale of Irvon, at the confluence of the rivers Irvon and Gwesin. Distance from Buallt, 14 m. W. by N. Pop., in 1801, 118; in 1831, 146. A. P., £293.

LLANDEWI-BREFI, a parish in the hundred of Penarth, co. of Cardigan, South Wales. Living, a perpetual curacy in the archd. of Cardigan and dio. of St David's, rated at £6, returned at £110 10s. 6d., and alternately in the patronage of the families of Crosswood and Price. These families likewise divide the rectorial tithes, having purchased the same from Lord Conyngham. The church is a venerable structure in the English style of architecture, and in the churchyard are some ancient and curious monuments. The Romans are supposed to have had a station here, named Loventium by Ptolemy, which appears to be confirmed by the discovery of coins and sculptured stones belonging to that people. A synod, at which St David was present, was held here in the year 519. This was the scene of a battle in 1073, when the princes of Powys vanquished Rhys-ap-Owen and Rhyddarch-ap-Caradog. The church was formerly collegiate, a precentor and 12 prebendaries having been placed here by Bishop Beck, in 1187. At the dissolution it was rated at £40. The parish lies on the river Tyvi near Pont-Llanico. Fairs are held here on May 7th, July 24th, October 9th, and November 13th. Distance from Lampeter, 6½ m. N. by E. Pop., in 1801, 1526; in 1831, 2461.

The parish lies on the river Mac-hawy, and contains about 2000 acres of land. Distance from Hay, 5½ m. W. by N. Pop., in 1801, 116; in 1831, 136. A. P., £630.

LLANDEWI-FELFREY, a parish in the hundreds of Narbeth and Dungleddy, co. of Pembroke, South Wales. The living consists of a sinecure rectory, rated at £8, and a discharged vicarage, rated at £7 9s. 4½d., and in the patronage of the lord-chancellor. The parish contains about 4000 acres of land. Distance from Narbeth, 3 m. N.E. Pop., in 1801, 557; in 1831, 710. A. P., £3,088.

LLANDEWI-IS-Y-CRAIG, a parish in the hundred of Arduwy, co. of Merioneth, North Wales. Living, a curacy in the dio. of Bangor, not in charge, annexed to the rectory of Llanennedwyn. The parish lies on the coast, and is crossed by the road from Barmouth to Harleigh. Distance from Barmouth, 4 m. N. by W. Pop., in 1801, 308; in 1831, 307. A. P., £1,277.

LLANDEWIRCWM, a parish in the hundred of Buallt, co. of Brecon, South Wales. Living, a perpetual curacy annexed to that of Buallt in the archd. of Brecon and dio. of St David's, rated at £5, returned at £58, and in the patronage of the family of Price of Knighton. The parish lies on the Duhawn-wy, near its confluence with the Wye, and is a fertile valley in the midst of a wild and rugged district. Distance from Bnallt, 3 m. S.W. Pop., in 1801, 135; in 1831, 230. A. P., £1,459.

LLANDEWL-YSTRAD-ENNAU, a parish in the hundreds of Cefn-Llys and Knighton, co. of Radnor, South Wales. Living, a perpetual curacy in the dio. of St David's, rated at £14 returned at £35 15s., subordinate to the vicarage of Llanbister. Patron, the prebendary of Llanbister. The parish—which contains the townships of the Church and of Maes-tre-Rhoe-llowddy—lies on the river Ithon, near Bleddfa forest. Here are traces of an ancient castle which belonged to the earl of Chester in the 12th century, and to the Mortimers in the 14th. Here is also a mound supposed to have been the site of a military station of the Welsh. Distance from Rhayader, 12 m. E. by S. Pop., in 1801, 459; in 1831, 653. A. P., £2,571.

LONDON,

The metropolis of the British empire, is a city and county of itself, locally situated in the hundred of Ossulston, county of Middlesex. Its suburbs are extensive, and extend into the counties of Surrey and Kent. It lies on the river Thames, the greater portion being on the northern banks, the centre, about St Paul's cathedral, being in 51° 31' north latitude, and 0° 52' west longitude.

Name.—The origin of the name is involved in considerable obscurity. The most common opinion is, that its ancient British name was Llyn-Dyn, the town on the lake, a name by no means inappropriate, when we remember the wide extent of marshy ground which formerly bordered, and must often have been overflowed by the river. The name Londinium, by which it was known to the Romans, is obviously a corruption of the more ancient appellation. This is doubtless the city of the Trinobantes, mentioned by Cæsar, and which is mentioned by Ammianus Marcellinus under the name of 'Augusta Trinobantium,' an ancient town, once called Lundinium.

History.—London first appears in history about the year 61, and is mentioned by Tacitus in his description of the spirited conduct of Queen Boadicea. It was then frequented by merchants, and an important commercial station. It was soon erected into a station and fortified, but the period at which it was first surrounded with walls is a matter of some doubt. The original station is supposed by Dr Stukeley to have formed an oblong square, extending in breadth from Maiden-lane to the Thames, and from Ludgate to Walbrook, a space not longer than half a mile, or broader than one-third of a mile. The original erection of the walls of London has been attributed by most writers to Constantine the Great; Maitland supposes them to have been the work of Theodosius, in the year 379. The wall began near the site of the present Tower, and ran along the Minories to Aldgate, whence it passed Broia-Marks, Houndsditch, Aldersgate, Old Newgate, Ludgate, and Fleet-brook, running down the bank of the latter to meet the Thames. This circuit was about 2 miles and 1 furlong in length, and included a space which was guarded on the side of the river by another wall 1 mile and 120 yards in length. The wall was about 22 feet high, and had 15 strong towers and bastions. A few traces of it yet exist in the court between Ludgate-hill and the Broadway; also in the churchyard of Cripplegate. From London there were originally four great roads leading to the different stations scattered over the kingdom. The original British Watling-street, formed into the Prætorian way, passed out at a gate near Old Newgate; the Ermin-street passed out by Cripplegate; others passed Aldersgate and Billingsgate. New gates and roads were subsequently formed, the names of which yet remain in Bridgegate, Ludgate, Moor-gate, Bishopsgate, and the postern on Tower-hill.

The town increased rapidly in importance under the dominion of the Romans, and many relics of the wealth and grandeur of that people have been discovered at various times. In 211 it was renowned for its commerce, and in 359 it had no less than 800 vessels of various sizes employed in the exportation of corn alone. In the fifth century it was abandoned by the Romans. After being for some time in the undisturbed possession of the Britons, it was taken, as the Saxon chronicle relates, about 477 by the Saxons under Hengist. Ambrosius retook it after the death of Hengist in 488, and it remained in the hands of the Britons for nearly a century after. It afterwards formed part of the Saxon kingdom of Essex, and on the introduction of Christianity was nominated as the see of a bishop: the first bishop—Melitus—being appointed in 604, and the cathedral being founded in 610, on the site now occupied by St Paul's.

During the Saxon heptarchy, history relates little respecting this city beyond a series of disasters. Plague ravaged it in 664; fire in 764, 798, and 801. A parliament was held here by Egbert in 833, subsequent to which it suffered severely from the inroads of the Danes. In 804 London was taken from the Danes by Alfred, and constituted by him the capital of all England. It was again consumed by fire in 893, but rose from its ashes with great rapidity. A royal palace and a mint were first established here by Athelstane in 925.

Being abandoned in 1013 by Ethelred II., London again fell under the dominion of the Danes, whose king, Sweyn, conferred the sovereignty on his son Canute. After a considerable resistance on the part of the inhabitants and of Edmund Ironside, this prince succeeded in establishing himself securely on his throne, and proceeded to levy an impost of £11,000 on the city; the payment of which is a strong proof of the wealth to which it had already risen.

The approach of William I. was early opposed by the citizens of London, who declared themselves in favour of Edgar Atheling, but the resistance was dropped in consequence of the influence exercised by the archbishops of Canterbury and York, and by the clergy in general.

The earliest charter under which the city was governed, is that granted by William I., which is still preserved in the archives of the city. It is remarkably laconic, and has been translated as follows:—"William the king greeteth William the bishop and Godfrey the portreeve, and all the burgesses within London, friendly. And I acquaint you, that I will that ye be, all three law-worthy, as ye were in King Edward's days. And I will that every child be his father's heir, after his father's days. And I will not suffer that any man do you any wrong.—God preserve you."

The city suffered severely from fire in 1077, and in the next year the Tower of London was erected. The perpetual sheriffwick of Middlesex was granted to the corporation by Henry I. in 1100, and gave a charter, in which the privileges of the citizens are for the first time distinctly enumerated. Previous to this time they had been matters of use and wont from time out of mind, they now became the subject of public record. The citizens took an active part in favour of the usurper Stephen, for which Henry II. revenged himself by the extortion of considerable sums of money under the name of free gifts. The chief magistrate, who had previously held the title of bailliff, received that of Mayor in the reign of Richard I., who granted several charters, and in particular, one on which the corporation has established their claim to the conservatorship of the Thames. In 1176 a bridge of stone was built; and 60 years later, the inhabitants, having been deprived of their usual supply of water, in consequence of the buildings extending over Oldbourn, Walbrook, and Langbourne, brought an additional supply from springs in the neighbourhood of Tyburn. In 1255, a conduit in Cheapside was supplied with water brought from Tyburn in leaden pipes. In 1258, according to the chronicles of Evesham, 20,000 persons died of hunger in consequence of a scarcity of corn. In 1264 a massacre of upwards of 500 Jews took place, on some trivial pretext. In 1320 a fish market was established at Fish-wharf; and in 1340 tolls were established for defraying the expenses of roads and streets. In the reign of Edward III. the citizens obtained many important privileges; such as the right of holding courts of jail-delivery for Newgate,—that the citizens should not be compelled to go to war out of the city,—and that the mayor should be the sole escheator within the city.

In 1348, a terrible plague appeared in England, having spread from the east and devastated the continent, an account of which may be found in Dr Barnes' history of Edward III. "But in the famous city of London," he says, "death was so outrageously cruel, that every day at least 20, sometimes 40 or 60, or more dead corpses were thrown together into one pit; and yet the church-yards not sufficing for the dead, they were fain to set apart certain fields for additional places of burial."—"But especially between Candlemas and Easter this year, (1349), there were buried in the place aforesaid, about 200 corpses per diem every day."—"The meanwhile, in consideration of this grievous mortality, all suits and pleadings in the King's Bench and other places ceased; and all sessions of parliament for the space of more than two years were hindered."—"But in England early this year the plague began to abate, and about the end of August was wholly extinct at London and in most other parts of the land; and immediately a more pleasant face of things began to smile, and cheer up the late dejected minds of the people; and thus we shall end this tragical chapter." In 1380, occurred the celebrated rebellion of Wat Tyler. His followers did much mischief in the town, many streets being burnt, the houses of the nobility plundered, and the prisoners in the Fleet, Newgate, and King's Bench, liberated. Another plague, in which 30,000 people lost their lives, occurred in 1406. The streets were first lighted, ten years after this, with lanterns, at the command of the mayor, Sir Henry Barton. The insurrection of Jack Cade occurred in 1450.

He entered London with his followers, and committed many outrages; among the rest, beheading Lord-treasurer Say, and other persons of consequence. At length, the citizens rose in opposition to him, assisted by the governor of the Tower, and expelled him from the city. He was soon after deserted by his followers, and met the fate he deserved. In 1460, the houses of London were first constructed of brick, at least the earliest historical notice of it appears at this time. In 1473, the right of choosing the lord-mayor and sheriffs was vested in the masters, wardens, and liveries of the different corporations. About this, or a year earlier, William Caxton established his printing press, under the patronage of the archbishop of Canterbury and abbot of Westminster, who gave him a place in his convent as a workshop. Soon after Henry VII. came to the throne, in 1485, the inhabitants of London suffered in common with the rest of the kingdom from a severe epidemic called the sweating sickness, of which two mayors and six aldermen died in one week. "In the 13th year of his reign, several gardens were destroyed in Finsbury, out of which a field for archers was formed, which was the origin of the artillery ground. The river Fleet was made navigable to Holborn-bridge. Houndsditch was arched over and Henry VII.'s chapel erected. The citizens were dreadfully plundered by this king and his iniquitous agents, Empson and Dudley."

In the reign of Henry VIII. the city received many improvements. The royal palaces of St James's and Bridewell were erected. The police was put under improved regulations, nuisances were removed, and streets were widened and paved. In consequence of the dissolution of the monasteries, many additional persons were thrown upon their own exertions for subsistence, and trade increased accordingly. The attempts made by Henry VIII. to exact money, were obstinately and successfully resisted by the citizens. In 1543, a sumptuary law was passed by the mayor and common-council, by which the mayor was ordered to confine himself to seven dishes at dinner or supper; the aldermen and sheriffs to six; and the sword-bearer to four.

The reign of Edward VI. was chiefly memorable from the erection of the hospitals of St Thomas, St Bartholomew, and Christ's, and the conversion of the palace of Bridewell into an hospital. In this reign, also, the borough of Southwark was constituted a ward of the city.

In the reign of Elizabeth a proclamation was issued, forbidding the further extension of the town by the erection of buildings on new foundations within three miles of the city gates. It may be interesting to many of our readers to know the extent of the town at that time. The following account is extracted from a late 'Picture of London':—"By a map then published, and still extant, it may be seen how much of that which is now the very interior of the town, was then field and garden. Then, as now, the most crowded part of the city, properly so called, extended from Newgate-street, Cheapside, and Cornhill, to the banks of the Thames. With the exception of Colman-street, and a few buildings here and there, from Lothbury to Bishopsgate and from Bishopsgate to the Tower, all was uncovered or garden ground. Goodman's-fields were only enclosed pasture-grounds; and there were very few buildings east of the Tower. Whitechapel consisted of a few houses only, and Houndsditch, which contained a single row of houses opposite to the city walls, opened behind into the fields. Spittalfields, from the back of the church, lay entirely open. From Bishopsgate Without to Shoreditch church, there existed a tolerably regular street, yet still with unoccupied sites intervening. West of Bishopsgate to Moorfields and Finsbury was nearly all unbuilt. From the upper end of Chiswell-street to Whitecross-street, there were very few houses, and Goswell-street was called the road to St Alban's. Clerkenwell was chiefly occupied by the monastery and church, Cowcross and part of St John's-street excepted. From the back of Cowcross to Gray's-inn-lane, which extended a very little way from Gray's inn, the ground was either unoccupied, or laid out in pasture or gardens. From Holborn-bridge to Red Lion-street, the houses continued on both sides, after which the road was open, or bounded on one side by a garden wall, to the village of St Giles, which was formed by a small cluster of houses on the right; it was therefore called the parish of St-Giles-in-the-Fields, which name it still bears. Beyond, all was country, both northward and westward, Oxford-street having trees and hedges on both sides; indeed, so recently as 1778, a German writer, describing the metropolis, speaks of Tyburn, the place of execution at that time, as being distant from London about two English miles. From Oxford round to Piccadilly there was a road called the Way from Reading, proceeding through Hedge-lane and the Haymarket—which avenues were entirely destitute of houses—to St James's hospital, now the palace, and a few small buildings on the side of Carlton-house, were all that existed of the present Pall-Mall. Leicester-square was all open fields; and St Martin's-lane had only a few buildings above the church towards the Convent-garden, which extended as a garden to Drury-lane, these buildings alone existing in that extensive site. Long-acre, Seven Dials, and even Drury-lane, to the top of Wych-street, were quite open. The Strand was a street with houses, but principally formed of the mansions of the nobility and prelates; those on the south side having large gardens open to the Thames. The present names of Norfolk-street, Arundel-street, Surrey-street, Salisbury-street, Cecil-street, Villiers-street, Buckingham-street, and several others, point out the relative situations of several of them. At that time it was customary for noblemen, resident on the banks of the Thames, to proceed to the court at Whitehall in their own barges, and, in consequence, they retained a number of watermen in livery, who were thereby protected from impressment. Spring-gardens were what the name imports, and the gardens extended to the present Treasury, which occupies the space of the Cockpit and Tilt-yard, opposite to which stood the palace of Whitehall.

From King-street to the Abbey the buildings were close and connected, as also from Whitehall to Palace-yard. Several houses also stood near the present Abingdon-street, and on the shore opposite to Lambeth-palace. On the Surrey side of the Thames there were but six or seven houses from Lambeth-palace to the shore opposite White-friars, where a line of houses with gardens commenced, which were continued to Winchester-house in Southwark. On the site of the present Christ-church stood a theatre with gardens; the place was called Paris-garden. Opposite to Queenhythe were the circular buildings appropriated to bull and bear beating, which Elizabeth often witnessed. Southwark extended but a little way down the High-street. London-bridge was crowded with buildings. Along Tooley-street to Horsleydown was much built over, after which a few houses and gardens only appeared." In 1594 the water of the Thames was first raised for the supply of the inhabitants. The engine was established at Broken-wharf, on the site subsequently occupied by the London-bridge water works. In 1603 the plague appeared here, and cut off 30,578 persons. The commerce of the city was now in the highest degree flourishing. The citizens were able to contribute to the fleet sent against the Spanish armada, 16 ships fully equipped, and manned with 10,000 men.

The year 1604 was memorable for the gunpowder plot. In 1613 Sir Hugh Myddleton completed the New River. In 1616 the paving of the sides of the streets with flag-stones was first introduced. In 1618, James issued a proclamation against the further extension of the city, which, however, appears to have been as little attended to as those of his predecessors. In the beginning of the reign of Charles I., 35,000 persons died of the plague. The exactions of the high-commission and star-chamber naturally led the citizens to take the part of the parliament in the subsequent civil war. The city still continuing to extend, the protector removed the former proclamations, and imposed taxes and fines on the owners of all houses erected within a certain period. In 1661, a great many streets in St James's parish were built or finished; among the rest, St James's-street, Pall-Mall, and Piccadilly: other streets were paved and widened, and candles, or lights in lanterns, were ordered to be hung out by every house fronting the streets, from Michaelmas to Lady-day, from dusk till nine in the evening.

The great plague, so called to distinguish it from the former visitations of pestilence, commenced in December 1664, and had not entirely ceased in January 1666. It is supposed to have been brought by infection from Holland, and broke out first in Long Acre. The cold of winter appears to have had a considerable influence upon its progress, but in May it began to spread rapidly, and between this time and October the deaths weekly ranged from 500 to 8000. The mortality was so great that ordinary graves could not be provided for the dead. Large carts were sent through the streets at certain hours, and the bodies which they collected were thrown into large pits dug for the purpose. In June, Charles II. left London with his court and took refuge in Oxford. All business was suspended, and even the centre of the exchange and some of the most public streets were overgrown with grass. The inns of court were closed and all law proceedings were stopped. The return of deaths from plague was 68,950, but it is thought that the returns fell far short of the actual number, which is generally estimated at upwards of 100,000. Since this period the plague has never re-appeared in London as an epidemic. Immediately succeeding the year of the great plague was that of the great fire. This broke out on Sunday morning, September 2d, 1666, at the house of a baker in Pudding-lane, not far from Thames-street. The wind happening to be strong, and the houses being for the most part constructed of wood, the fire spread with great violence and raged during four days and four nights. Within the walls it consumed about five-sixths of the city, and without the walls, about one-fifth as much. Many public buildings and churches suffered, but St Paul's cathedral and some of the corporation-halls escaped. The fire extended its ravages over an oblong space measuring upwards of a mile in length and half a mile in breadth. It destroyed 13,000 houses, and the value of property consumed is calculated at not less than £10,000,000 sterling, though it could never be exactly ascertained. To commemorate this terrible occurrence, the monument on Fish-street-hill was erected in 1671-77, under the superintendence of Sir Christopher Wren. This is a fluted column of the Doric order. The height from the pavement is 202 feet, the diameter of the body or shaft is 15 feet, the ground bounded by the lowest part of the pedestal is 28 feet square, and the pedestal is 40 feet high. The top may be reached by means of a large winding stair-case, consisting of 345 steps. Above the capital is a cippus, supporting a gilded blazing urn. "The fire of London," says Mr Hume, "though at that time a great calamity, has proved in the issue beneficial both to the city and kingdom. The city was rebuilt in a very little time; and care was taken to make the streets wider and more regular than before. A discretionary power was assumed by the king to regulate the distribution of the buildings, and to forbid the use of lathe and timber, the materials of which the houses were formerly composed. The necessity was so urgent and the occasion so extraordinary, that no exceptions were taken at an exercise of authority, which otherwise might have been deemed illegal. Great advantages have resulted from the alterations; London became much more healthy after the fire. The plague, which used to break out with great fury twice or thrice every century, and, indeed, was always lurking in some corner or other of the city, has scarcely ever appeared since that calamity." The number of houses erected in the city is said to have been greater than that of those which were destroyed, for the extensive gardens which were formerly attached to the houses of rich merchants and to the halls of various corporations were built upon. There was still a prejudice against the increase of the city, and in 1674, an act was passed imposing severe penalties on the erection of houses on new foundations. In 1683 the penny-post was established. The privilege of sanctuary, which belonged to various places in the metropolis, as Salisbury and Mitre courts, and Ram-alley in Fleet-street; Fulwood's-vents and Baldwin's-gardens, Holborn; Sanctuary, Minorities; Savoy, Strand, &c., was suppressed in 1697, a measure of great importance, as those places had become the haunts of vice and the refuge of the most abandoned characters. The year 1703 was remarkable for a terrible storm which raged during the night of the 29th of November. Two millions sterling is estimated to have been the damage suffered by the city alone, and the ships in the river were driven from their moorings, many of smaller size being destroyed. Upwards of 200 persons were either killed or maimed. At sea, immense damage was done by the same storm. Twelve men-of-war were lost on the shore of our own island, having more than 1800 men on board. In 1711, fifty new churches were erected in and about London, the expense of which was defrayed by a tax, levied on imported coals, for eight years. St Paul's cathedral was completed about this time. In 1714, George I. made his public entry into London. The next year more than 120 houses were destroyed by fire in Thames-street, and 50 persons perished. In 1722, the Chelsea water-company was formed, for the better supplying of Westminster and the western suburbs with water. During the reign of George II., great improvements were made in the metropolis and its neighbourhood; several new parishes were formed, as St George's, Bloomsbury; St Ann's, Limehouse; St Paul's, Deptford, &c. Fleet-ditch was arched over, and a part of the site is occupied by Fleet-market. Grosvenor-square and Westminster bridge were built; the houses on London bridge were removed, and new roads were made in various directions. During the reign of George III. the metropolis continued to extend, and many important improvements were effected. Most of the city gates were removed; in 1768, commissioners were appointed by parliament to superintend and regulate the paving, lighting, cleaning, and watching the streets, as well as the stands of hackney coaches. Various companies for supplying water and gas have since been established. The events which have occurred in London during the present and the latter part of the former century, are too numerous to admit of sufficient condensation for the present work. The extension of the city has continued during that period; its present extent will be noticed hereafter.

Situation, &c.—The metropolis is situated on the banks of the river Thames, at the distance of about 60 m. from the sea. On the north side of the river, the ground rises in a gentle slope, but on the south side the surface is uniformly flat. The highest level in London above high-water mark, is at the north side of the aqueduct, crossing the Regent's canal, which is 103 feet 6 inches. The north end of Northumberland-street, Strand, is elevated 19 feet, 7 inches; the centre of Regent's-circus, 77 feet, 2 inches; the base of St Paul's, 52 feet. The whole of Westminster, except the abbey and part of the Horse-ferry road, is below the level of the highest tide.

Climate.—The temperature of London ranges from 20° to 81° Fahr., and the average has been calculated at 51° 9'. The limits of the annual variation appear to be one degree above and one and a half below the mean. The thermometer has been known to fall six degrees below zero, and to rise to 94° in the shade, but these are extremely rare occurrences. The quantity of rain which falls is various, and it is calculated that London is one of the driest places in the kingdom. The average of four years at the end of last century, gives 19 inches; in 1802, 15 inches fell; in 1806, 27. The metropolis is subject to dense fogs, especially during the months of November and December, rendering it necessary to use lights in shops and warehouses throughout the day. The most prevalent wind in London is the S.W., the least common is the N., the former being calculated to blow during 112 days, and the latter only during 16 days of the year. The S.W. appears to prevail chiefly in July and August; the N.E. in January, March, April, May, and June; the N.W. occurs most frequently from November to March. The mean height of the barometer is stated to be 29.9 inches.

Mortality.—London is remarkably healthy, though many circumstances, too obvious to require notice, would lead us to expect the contrary. In 1700, the rate of mortality was one in 26; in 1815, it was one in 38. The salubrity of London arises from several causes.

Divisions.—We shall here follow the divisions given by Mr Rickman, in his statement of the population returns for 1831. He divides it into London within the walls; London without the walls; the borough of Southwark; the city of Westminster; parishes within the bills of mortality; and lastly, a few parishes not within the bills of mortality.

1. London within the walls is the original metropolis of the kingdom. It extends along the north side of the Thames, from Tower-hill to the foot of Ludgate-hill, a distance of a mile and a quarter. On the south it is bounded by the river, which is here crossed by Southwark and London bridges. It is bounded on all the rest of its circumference by the division of London without the walls, with the exception of a short space on the east, where it is bounded by the Town-liberty and Old precinct. The area is about 370 acres, and rather more than three miles in circumference. Within the walls are 97 parishes. "In the beginning of last century, the population was not much less than 140,000, as proved by deduction from the parish registers; and the annual mortality was as 1 to 20 of that population. Fortunately for the health of the citizens, space is becoming more valuable for warehouses than for human habitations, so that the population of the city within the walls is diminished to 55,778, and the rate of mortality to less than 1 in 40."

2. London without the walls. This is a space of various width, extending around the walls of the ancient city, beginning at the Thames, where it is crossed by Blackfriar's bridge, and running northward, eastward, and south-eastward, round the city as far as the Town-liberty. On the outer side it is bounded by the parish of St Clement-Davis; Rolls liberty; parishes of St Andrew, Holborn, and St Sepulchre; Glasshouse-yard; parish of St Luke, Middlesex; Norton-Fulgate liberty; Old Artillery-yard; Christ-church parish, Spitalfields, and Whitechapel; and the Town-liberty. The main part of this area extends westward to Temple-Bar, constituting what was in the reigns of the Plantagenets the best part of the town. It occupies about 230 acres. From the same causes as were already mentioned, the population of the city without the walls has diminished though not in an equal degree with that of the city within the walls. In the beginning of last century, the population was 60,000; it was 66,209, in 1831.

3. The borough of Southwark lies on the south side of the Thames, along which it extends for a distance of two miles. Its form is somewhat irregular. It sends a long narrow branch about a mile in length down the Kent road, and extends southward about a mile between the parishes of Lambeth and St-Mary-Butts. This district has repeatedly been granted to the city. Maitland says, "In the year 1550, the citizens having purchased of King Edward VI. the borough of Southwark, with divers privileges thereunto belonging, they erected the same into a 26th ward, called Bridge-ward-without; but it seems the power granted them by charter not proving sufficient to support their title thereunto, by excluding the justices of peace for the county of Surrey from interfering in the government thereof, it is therefore only a nominal ward: however, it serves to dignify the senior alderman, called the Father of the city, who generally by his great age is rendered unable to undergo the fatigue of business; therefore, as there is nothing to be done, 'tis a post fit for one worn out with age." The borough of Southwark includes 600 acres. The river is here crossed by Blackfriar's, Southwark, and London bridges. The population has been rather more than doubled since the commencement of last century.

4. The city of Westminster is a very extensive part of the metropolis. It extends along the Thames from Chelsea to Temple-stairs, a distance of about 3 m. It is bounded by St Luke's parish, Chelsea; Kensington, Paddington, St Mary-le-bone, and St George, Bloomsbury. It is bounded on the north by Oxford-street, whence the boundary line passes along Crown-street, Castle-street, and Drury-lane, encircling in the western direction Hyde-park, and Kensington-gardens. The population of the city of Westminster, in 1831, was 202,891.

5. The division including the parishes within the bills of mortality. This term is derived from the following circumstance: London sufferred frequently, as has already been related, from various pestilences, especially the plague; this frequent recurrence caused the establishment of notices, called weekly bills of mortality, kept and published by the parish-clerks, as a warning to the court and others to leave London whenever the plague became more fatal than usual. The somewhat obsolete names of diseases in these bills, have injured their reputation, and in some of the large parishes they are discontinued. The parishes within the bills are, Lambeth, South Lambeth, Vauxhall, Newington-Bath, Bermondsey, Horsley-down, and Rotherhithe, which are in the county of Surrey; St Andrews, Holborn, St Giles, St George's, Bloomsbury, part of Pancras, Clerkenwell, Spitalfields, Bethnal-green, St Luke's, Shoreditch, Whitechapel, St George's on the East, Shadwell, Limehouse, Islington, Hackney, Stepney, and Stratford-le-Bow. In consequence of the great increase of population, it was found necessary to divide some of the large out-parishes. This has been the case in particular with the parish of Stepney, which formerly contained those of Stratford-le-Bow, Whitechapel, Limehouse, Wapping, Shadwell, Ratcliffe-highway, Spitalfields, and Bethnal-green; and even yet is one of the largest parishes within the bills of mortality. The population of this division has been more than doubled since the beginning of the last century.

6. The parishes not within the bills of mortality are Chelsea, Kensington, St Mary-le-bone, Paddington, and St Pancras, with part of Highgate. The increase of population in these within a century and a third has been prodigious, being from 9150 to 293,560.

Line of the Streets.—“It has been remarked,” says a writer in the Edinburgh Encyclopedia, “that it is much easier to acquire a practical knowledge of the geography of London than of Paris, which has not the same rallying points except the Seine. In London, the principal streets follow the course of the Thames from west to east, and the main cross streets run chiefly in a direction from north to south. Entering London from the west, there are two principal avenues or grand lines of streets: If we enter from the west on the northern side of the city, the first street is Oxford-street, which leads through St Giles', Holborn, Skinner-street, Snow-hill, Newgate-street, Cheapside, Cornhill, and Leadenhall-street, to Whitechapel and Mile-end, on the road into Essex: If we enter by the Bath road, on the south side of Hyde-park, the streets are Piccadilly, St James's-street, Pall-Mall, Charing-cross, Strand, Fleet-street, Ludgate-hill, St Paul's-churchyard, Watling-street, Cannon-street, Tower-street, Wapping, Limehouse, &c. The two principal avenues—Piccadilly and the Strand—Oxford-street and Holborn—unite at St Paul's, whence, as from a common centre, they separate again to form two other great avenues—Cheapside and Watling-street. The longest line of street, though under several different names, which runs from south to north, is the principal street in Southwark, which extends from the country to London-bridge, and thence, under the names of Fishstreet-hill, Gracechurch-street, Bishopsgate-street, Shoreditch, &c. to the northern extremity of the city, on the road to Kingsland, Hackney, &c. The longest street in London under one appellation is Oxford-street, which is 1 mile, 2 furlongs, and 19 poles in length.” London is computed to have contained in 1830, 80 squares, 9000 streets, lanes, rows, places, &c., in which the houses were not less than 170,000. All the streets are paved with great regularity, and have a foot path laid with flags, divided from the carriage way; the latter is formed by small cubical blocks of Scotch granite. The footway has a regular curb-stone, and is divided from the carriage way by a gutter, which flows into the common sewer. Some of the streets have recently been partially Macadamised. Nearly all are lighted with gas, which is supplied by several companies. The London Gas-light company has existed since 1812; it has works in the Horse-ferry-road, Westminster, in Brick-lane, Spitalfields, and on the Curtain-road. It consumes about 20,000 chaldrons of coals annually, and the main pipes extend 125 miles. The City Gas company has works in Dorset-street, Salisbury-square; those of the South London company are at Bankside; the Imperial company, near the Hackney-road, and the London Portable Gas company, in St John-street, Clerkenwell.

The most elegant streets in London are situated in the west end of the town. Few streets can compete with Regent-street, Portland-place, and the buildings around or near the Regent's park. Many of the latter are of recent erection, and new houses are springing up with great rapidity. At the west end of the town also are the parks. St James's-park lies near the palaces of St James's and Whitehall. It is of a triangular shape, and its greatest length is rather more than half a mile. This was a complete marsh till enclosed and drained by Henry VIII. In the centre is a long irregular sheet of water, and around are agreeable walks. The Green-park lies in the immediate vicinity of that of St James's, and extends from it to Piccadilly. Near the place where the two parks meet is the royal palace, erected on the site of Buckingham-house, to the west of which is a large triangular space of ground called the palace garden. Hyde-park is an extensive piece of ground extending westward from Park-lane, and bounded at its western extremity by the ends of Oxford-street and Piccadilly. On the west it touches Kensington-gardens, and the whole area is about 395 acres. It is intersected with walks, and planted with very fine trees, and is much frequented at certain times both by pedestrians, equestrians, and carriages. No hackney coaches are admitted. There are five entrances, each of which has an elegant lodge. At Hyde-park-corner, at the end of Piccadilly, the entrance is through a triumphal arch. At the S.E. corner is a colossal statue of Achilles, erected in honour of the duke of Wellington's military achievements. The metal was obtained from twelve 24-pounders taken in the battles of Salamanca, Vittoria, Toulouse, and Waterloo. On the south side of the park are the barracks of the Life-guards. The Serpentine river is situated in Hyde-park, near the south side. It is in the form of a parallelogram, and was dug about the year 1730. The Regent's-park is situated at the north-western angle of the metropolis, in the parishes of Pancras and Mary-le-bone, but chiefly in the latter. It is nearly of a circular form, and contains about 450 acres. Many trees have been planted here, though a large proportion are still young. The shrubbery is tastefully arranged, and the walks are agreeable. On the western side is a sheet of water above half a mile in length, of an irregular form, and studded with small islands. In the centre is a large circular spot called the Ring, laid out with greater regularity and neatness. Around this are three villas in Grecian styles of architecture, called South villa, the Holme, and St John's-wood lodge. There are other villas in different parts of the park, a part of the northern border of which has also been granted to the Zoological society, whose gardens will be described elsewhere. The buildings around the Regent's-park are among the most recently erected in London, and deserve particular notice. At the entrance from Portland-place is Park-crescent, the buildings of which are handsome; we next come to Park-square, a short distance from which, on the east side, are the handsome structures containing the Diorama and Colosseum. Proceeding along the road we pass Cambridge-terrace, a fine row of houses in the Roman style; Chester-terrace, a row designed by Mr Nash, in the Corinthian order, with a great profusion of decorations; Cumberland-terrace, also designed by Mr Nash, consisting of a centre and two wings, the former being a splendid colonnade of twelve columns. Further on are the marquess of Hertford's villa, Grove-house, and Hanover-lodge, erected after designs by Mr D. Burton. Hanover-terrace was planned by Mr Nash, as also Sussex-place, a whimsical range of buildings consisting of a centre with a pediment, flanked by octagonal towers and wings, with four similar towers, the whole being disposed in a semicircular form, with a garden in front. All the towers are finished with cupola tops and minarets, which give them a very singular appearance. Cornwall and York-terraces are handsome ranges of houses, the former designed by Mr D. Burton, the latter by Mr Nash. The entrances to York-terrace are all on the side farthest from the park, so that it has the appearance of a single building, with the magnificence of a palace. Ulster-terrace is the corner of Park-square, thus bringing us to the point from which we started.

Palaces.—St James's palace is situated near the corner of the Green-park, opposite the foot of St James's-street, and looking toward the south over St James's-park. It was erected by Henry VIII. on the site of an hospital for lepers, dedicated also to St James. Since the destruction of Whitehall in 1695, this has been the town-residence of the English kings, nevertheless it presents few external attractions; in fact, its general aspect is mean. It is constructed chiefly of brick, and the gateway looking towards St James's-street has much more the aspect of a prison than a palace. In 1809, the south-east wing was burnt, and is still in ruins, though the other parts of the palace received a thorough repair about three years ago. The state-apartments were newly furnished in 1824, and are very handsome, though in a remarkably plain taste.

Buckingham-house, on the site of which the new palace has been erected, was built in 1703 by John Sheffield, duke of Buckingham. In 1761 it was purchased for the town residence of Charlotte, queen of George III. In constructing the new palace a very small portion of the old structure has been allowed to remain. The whole forms three sides of a square. The basement is of Doric, and the superstructure of the Corinthian order, designed by Mr Nash. Though highly ornamented, and erected at a great expense, this building has not given general satisfaction, and least of all to his late majesty George IV., for whom it was built. It has an insignificant appearance, and there is an ugly hemisphere of stone above the centre which has a very bad effect. Above the central pediment, as well as on the faces of the wings, there are emblematical statues. A semicircular space in front is enclosed with a massive iron railing, in the middle of which is the grand entrance, an arch of white marble, copied from that of Constantine at Rome, over which it is intended to place an equestrian statue of George IV. Many of the mantle-pieces and other ornaments belonging to this palace formerly adorned Carlton-house, at the east end of Pall-Mall. This was the town-residence of his late majesty when Prince Regent, and was a small inconvenient structure, which was taken down some time ago.

The palace of Whitehall, which stood at the east end of St James's park, was in a great measure destroyed by fire. The portion now remaining is called the Banqueting-house, the great room of which is used as a chapel. The ceiling was painted by Rubens. In the space behind the Banqueting-house is a brass statue of James II. by Gibbons.

Kensington palace is situated in the gardens of the same name, at the west end of Hyde-park. This was bought by William III. from the chancellor Finch. The building is plain, and very irregular. It contains a good collection of pictures, and the grand staircase and the ceilings of many of the rooms were painted by Kent.

The most important residences of the nobility deserve some notice in this place. Apsley-house, at Hyde-park-corner, is the residence of the duke of Wellington, though originally built by lord-chancellor Apsley, after designs by Messrs Adam. It has lately been remodelled under the direction of Sir J. Wyattville. It is in the Corinthian style.—Gower, or York-house, is situated at the corner of the Green-park. It was founded in 1825, and intended for the residence of the late duke of York. It is now the property of the duke of Sutherland. It is a large quadrangular structure in the Corinthian style of architecture. The north front exhibits a portico of eight columns, which is the entrance. The east side has no projecting columns; the south and west project slightly at each end, and in the centre of each are six Corinthian columns supporting a pediment.—Northumberland-house, near Charing-cross, is the town-residence of the duke of Northumberland. It has an imposing but not an elegant appearance, and was erected in the reign of James I. by the earl of Northampton. It extends backward from the street forming a spacious quadrangle, from behind which two wings 100 feet in length run down towards the river. After the death of the earl of Northampton it was possessed by the earl of Suffolk, from whom it passed by marriage into the Northumberland family in 1642. The interior is fitted up in a magnificent style, and contains a superb collection of paintings. Behind the house a garden extends to the Thames.—Burlington-house, in Piccadilly, is the residence of Lord Cavendish. It is surrounded by a lofty wall, so that its beauties are not seen from the street. It is in the Doric order of architecture.—Spencer-house, in St James's-place, is the residence of Earl Spencer. It is a handsome square structure, surrounded with shrubbery, and having a fine front looking toward the Green-park.—Marlborough-house, in Pall-Mall, was the residence erected for the great duke of Marlborough. It was lately the residence of Prince Leopold of Saxe Coburg.—Among the other splendid residences of the nobility may be mentioned those of the earl of Chesterfield in South Audley-street, of the duke of Devonshire in Piccadilly, of the late duke of Manchester in Manchester-square, of the marquess of Anglesea in Burlington-gardens, of the marquess of Hertford in Regent's-park and Piccadilly, of the duke of Buckingham in Pall-Mall, of the duke of Norfolk in St James's-square, of the marquess of Lansdowne in Berkeley-square, of the duke of Portland in Cavendish-square, of Earl Grosvenor in Upper Grosvenor-street, and Melbourne-house, Whitehall.

Squares.—The squares of London are numerous, and contain some of the finest residences in the metropolis. Bedford-square is near the east end of Oxford-street; it is spacious and regular, but not worthy of particular notice.—Belgrave-square, about a quarter of a mile west of the new palace, was begun in 1825. It is 684 feet by 617, and consists of elegant houses adorned with Corinthian columns. Berkeley-square lies to the north of Piccadilly, and contains Lansdowne-house, the residence of the marquess of Lansdowne. The area in the centre contains three acres, and was formerly adorned with an equestrian statue of George III.—Bloomsbury-square lies to the north of High-Holborn, and formerly contained the residence of the duke of Bedford. Here are the monument of the duke of Bedford, and a bronze statue of the Right Hon. Charles James Fox, the work of Westmacott, erected in 1816.—Cavendish-square, near Langham-place and Regent-street, contains a gilt equestrian statue of William, duke of Cumberland, erected in 1770.—Covent-garden, between the Strand and Long-acre, occupies about three acres, and is so called from its having been the garden of the convent of St Peter. In the centre is the market of Covent-garden, on the west side is the church of St Paul, and on the north a piazza, designed by Inigo Jones.—Eaton-square, near Belgrave-square, is 1637 feet by 371, and contains St Peter's church. Eaton-square was founded in 1812, and was but lately finished. It is crossed by the New Road, and contains St Pancras new church.—Finsbury-square is situated in the east, about half a mile north of the bank. The houses are regular and handsome. A little to the south of this is Finsbury circus. Fitzroy-square was completed in 1825, after the designs of Messrs Adams. It is one of the most elegant in London, though not of great extent, and lies near the Regent's-park, a little to the south of the New Road.—Golden-square lies near the east end of Piccadilly, and is about 150 years old.—Grosvenor-square lies at an equal distance from the south side of Oxford-street and the end of Hyde-park. It contains most magnificent houses, and a fine garden in the centre, containing about six acres. A gilt equestrian statue of George I. has stood in the centre since 1726.—Hanover-square, near the corner of Oxford and Regent-streets, contains many handsome residences.—St James's-square is situated near the north side of Pall-Mall, and is of considerable extent. In the centre is a statue of William III., surrounded by a piece of water. Here are the residences of the bishop of London, Lord Ellenborough, and Sir P. Hastings; also Norfolk-house, in which George III. was born.—Leicester-square, to the east of Piccadilly, contains a fine equestrian statue of George I. Here lived Sir Joshua Reynolds, Woollet the engraver, Hogarth, and John Hunter the celebrated anatomist.—Lincoln's-Inn Fields, which lie to the south of Holborn, are surrounded by irregular houses. The space is the largest inclosed ground in London, and is well planted. The execution of Lord Russell took place in the centre of this area in 1683. Here is the building belonging to the royal college of surgeons, containing their library and the anatomical museum of John Hunter.—Manchester-square contains the residence of the marquess of Hertford. This was originally built by the duke of Manchester, and was for some time the residence of the Spanish ambassador. Portman-square, which lies to the north of the west end of Oxford-street, was begun in 1764. The houses are very fine, and the centre is formed into a garden with remarkably luxuriant shrubbery.—Prince's-square, which is very small, and lies a little to the north of the London-docks, is only worthy of notice from its containing the Swedes' church, in which lies buried the celebrated Emanuel Swedenborg.—Queen-square, a little to the north of Bloomsbury-square, contains a statue of Queen Anne. In the southwest angle is the church of St George the Martyr.—Russell-square, very near the last, is a handsome square, containing very good houses. Here is a colossal statue of the late duke of Bedford, erected in 1809. It is cast in bronze, and is the work of Westmacott. In this square are the houses in which lived Sir Samuel Romilly and Sir Thomas Lawrence. Soho-square is near the east end of Oxford-street, and takes its name from the word Soho having been the word of the day at Sedgmore. Here was the house of the duke of Monmouth, and in the south-west angle is the former residence of Sir Joseph Banks. In the centre of the garden is a pedestrian statue of Charles II. In the north-western corner is the Bazaar. Tavistock-square consists of elegant houses, but is not worthy of particular notice.—Trinity-square, in Newington-Butts, contains Trinity church, before which stands a statue of King Alfred.—There are many other squares in this city, but these are the most deserving of notice.

Statues.—We have already noticed various public monuments and statues to eminent individuals which adorn the metropolis; a few remain to be noticed. At Charing-cross is a statue of Charles I., executed in 1633, by Le Sueur. This was sold by the parliamentary party, and supposed to have been broken up, but after the restoration it was brought forward by the person who had purchased it, and resold to the government. Within the inclosure fronting St Paul's is the statue of Queen Anne, by Bird. In Hanover-square is a statue of William Pitt, the work of Chantrey, cast in bronze, and erected in 1831. A statue of the late George Canning was erected in 1832, in Palace-yard. It is colossal, cast in bronze, and the work of Mr Westmacott. Temple-bar is adorned on the east side with statues of Queen Elizabeth and James I., and on the west side with statues of Charles I. and II. Between Whitehall and the Thames stands a bronze statue of James II., executed by Gibbons. There are other statues and monuments which will be noticed along with the public buildings in which they are placed.

Bridges.—The bridges over the Thames are among the finest objects in London. Highest up the river is Vauxhall-bridge. This was founded in 1813, and completed in three years. It consists of nine arches of cast-iron, resting on piers formed by a wooden frame as a foundation, and faced with Kentish rag-stone and Roman cement. It has a light and elegant appearance, and is 860 feet in length. The span of each arch is 78 feet and the height 29. The architect was Mr Walker, and the expense of erection was £150,000, which is to be defrayed by the tolls exacted from all passengers. It receives its name from the vicinity of Vauxhall-gardens. It is proposed to carry a new bridge from the Horse-ferry road to Lambeth-stairs. Westminster-bridge is the second in order. It crosses the river in the immediate vicinity of Westminster-hall, and was begun in 1739 and completed in 1750. The architect was Mons. Labelle, a Frenchman, and the expense of erection was about £389,000. It is built of Portland stone, and consists of 15 arches, gradually diminishing from the centre to each end, that in the centre 76 feet span, those at each end 20. The arches are all semicircular. The length of the whole is 1223 feet, and the extreme breadth 44. The road over this bridge was Macadamized in 1824.—The next in order is Waterloo-bridge, which crosses the Thames a little to the west of Somerset-house. An act of parliament for its erection was obtained in 1806. It was originally planned by Mr G. Dodd, but executed under the superintendence of Mr Rennie. The works were begun in 1811, and on the 18th of June, 1817, it was opened in the presence of various distinguished persons. The structure is formed of granite, and each pier rests on 320 piles. All the arches are elliptical, and of equal size, so that the surface is level, in which circumstance this bridge surpasses all the others in London. The summit is exactly on a level with the Strand, and 50 feet above the level of the Thames. It is much frequented as a promenade, and the view from it is very fine. In order to connect the bridge with the streets on the same level on each side, the road is supported on brick arches, of which there are 60 on the Surrey side. The whole length of the structure, including the concealed arches, is 2890 feet; the length of the bridge is 1242; the width within the balustrade 42; the span of each arch 120; the thickness of each pier 20. At each end are two handsome toll lodges, in the Doric style.—Next in order is Blackfriars-bridge. This was constructed between 1760 and 1768, after the plan of Mr R. Mylne, at an expense of £152,840. It was intended that this bridge should bear the name of William Pitt, earl of Chatham, which is stated on the plate buried under the foundation. The arches are nine in number, and of the elliptical form. The central arch has a span of 100 feet, and the whole length of the bridge is 995. It rises considerably in the centre, and commands a fine view of the river, the city and borough, the monument, St Paul's cathedral, &c. Above each pier is a recess, supported by Ionic pillars. The width between the balustrades is 35 feet.—Southwark-bridge crosses the river about half a mile below the last. It was founded in 1814, and completed in 1819, under the superintendence of Mr Rennie, assisted by Mr Weston. The iron work was cast in the foundry of Messrs Walker & Co. of Rotherham. It consists of three arches, the centre one having a space of 240 feet, and the others 210 feet each. The arches are of iron, resting on piers of solid masonry founded on piles. The whole weight of iron employed in the construction of this bridge is above 5,308 tons. The whole expense, including that of forming the approaches, which was great, was about £800,000. Its general aspect is very striking. About one-third of a mile lower is the New London-bridge. The first stone of this building was laid on the 27th of April, 1825, and it was finally completed on the 31st of July, 1831. It was opened with great pomp by the king on the 1st of August. This bridge consists of five semi-elliptical arches. The least of these is larger than any other stone arch of this form ever erected. The centre arch is 152 feet span, with a rise above high water mark of 29 feet 6 inches. The roadway is 53 feet wide between the parapets, the footways occupying 9 feet each; the rise in the road is 1 in 132. The length of the bridge from the extremities of the abutments is 928 feet. The whole is constructed of granite, after the design of the late Mr Rennie, and the quantity of stone employed amounts to 120,000 tons. No tolls are levied on this bridge. The expense was defrayed partly by the corporation and partly by government. The share of the corporation is to be defrayed by a tax of 10d. per chaldron, levied during the next 26 years, on all coals entering the port of London.—Old London-bridge was the lowest structure on the river. It is now in process of being pulled down. It was begun in 1176, and was then covered with houses, chiefly constructed of timber. In 1212, a dreadful fire took place here, and many people perished. In 1756, the houses were finally removed. The bridge has long been found inconvenient from the narrowness of the arches, and were dangerous to the navigation.—The Thames tunnel deserves to be noticed here. As early as the year 1802, a project was set on foot with a view of opening an archway under the Thames, between Rotherhithe and Limehouse, upwards of a mile and a half below London-bridge. Various attempts were made, and a narrow passage was formed upwards of 900 feet in length, but the river breaking in frequently, the undertaking was abandoned in 1809. The subject was again revived by Mr Brunel, some years after, and a new company was incorporated by act of parliament in 1824. The work was begun in March, 1825. After various difficulties, more especially from the bursting in of the river, the tunnel was carried out upwards of 550 feet into the bed of the river. On the 18th of May, 1827, however, the river broke in through the roof and filled the tunnel. After examining the hole from without, with the assistance of a diving bell, the damage was repaired by throwing into the opening about 9000 tons of clay, contained in bags armed with small hazel rods. The water was pumped out of the tunnel by the 21st of June, and after repairing the slight damage which the works had suffered, the workmen proceeded in the excavation, which was carried 50 feet farther. The roof gave way again, however, in the month of January, 1828, when six men were drowned, and Mr Brunel, Jun., was placed in the utmost hazard of his life. The same means were used on this occasion as on the former, and 4000 tons of clay were required for filling the opening. The resources of the company were now at an end, and after clearing out the water and mud they discontinued the works, which have not since that time been resumed. The tunnel, so far as it has been carried, consists of a double carriage way, with paths for foot passengers; the whole structure is 38 feet in width, and 22 feet 6 inches in height. At high water the head of the river is about 75 feet above the roof. The ground is also arched, so that the whole structure may be said to consist of two cylinders, having a central portion common to both. The ground is very unequal in firmness, and it has been found necessary to prepare much of it for the work, by the processes of underpinning and underlaying. The subscriptions raised by the company amounted to £100,000, which sum has been expended, and there is no present prospect of their being able to resume the works.

Population.—At the beginning of the last century the population of London was about 674,000. It had increased in 1801, to 864,845; in 1811, to 1,009,546; in 1821, to 1,225,694; and in 1831, to 1,474,069. The population of the several districts is thus given in Mr Rickman's work :

It is usual to allow an addition of one twenty-fifth part for seamen belonging to registered shipping, soldiers quartered in the various barracks, and for the transitory population always arriving and departing so irregularly as to prevent a proper enumeration being made. Taking this into account, the total population of all the parishes whose churches lie within 8 m. in a direct line from St Paul's church, was 1,776,556, in 1831. The number of marriages which took place in 1811, was 11,549; of baptisms, 20,274; of burials, 20,726. In 1820, there were 12,757 marriages, 30,422 baptisms, and 24,367 burials. These returns are of course extremely imperfect.

Fairs and Markets.—There is but one annual fair in London, that of St Bartholomew, which is opened on the 3d of September and continues for four days. It is now held chiefly for amusement, but formerly was celebrated for extensive sales of cloth and other goods. In the villages around London numerous fairs are held.

Smithfield market is open on Mondays and Thursdays for the sale of cattle. The value of the cattle sold annually here is said to average £8,000,000. The number of oxen averages 156,000; of sheep and lambs 1,500,000; of calves 21,000; of hogs 20,000. Leaden-hall market is held for the sale of country-killed meat, skins, and leather; Newgate-market is also open on Mondays, Wednesdays, and Fridays, for country-killed meat, and daily for provisions. At these two markets there is an extensive sale of pigs, poultry, eggs, fish, butter, &c. Farringdon-market, for butcher's meat, fruit, vegetables, &c., is situated between Farringdon-street and Shoe-lane, to which site it was removed in 1829, from the situation which it had occupied since 1737, on the site of Fleet-Ditch. The ground and houses which were taken down were purchased by the corporation at an expense of £200,000, and the new building erected on the site of the latter, cost upwards of £80,000. It covers an area of an acre and a half, and is 232 feet in length by 150. A double row of shops forms an avenue round three sides of the quadrangle, and there are two great entrances for waggons and two for foot passengers. Finsbury-market is held on Mondays, Wednesdays, and Fridays, in the sale of butcher's meat, vegetables, &c. There are various other markets for butcher's meat, &c., as Newport-market, Borough-market, besides those which are held in the adjacent villages. At Billingsgate is a fish-market which was long the only one in the metropolis. Among the recent improvements of the metropolis, may be noted the erection of Hungerford-market. An act was obtained for this purpose in 1830. The site of the old market has been purchased, together with the surrounding houses, those in Hungerford-street, and some few in the Strand, in order to insure a proper frontage and a convenient access. The new-market was designed by Mr C. Fowler. The front to the river is elegant. The basement of the centre next the river constitutes the Fish-market. The wings are intended for taverns, connected by a colonnade, with a terrace which occupies the entire front. From the Fish-market the ascent is by a spacious flight of steps in the centre externally, and two stair-cases within, at the extremities of the portico, which is separated from the hall by a series of arches. The hall, exclusive of the portico, is 157 feet long by 123 feet wide, consisting of a nave and two aisles, besides ranges of shops against the side walls with galleries over. These galleries will be appropriated for the sale of such articles as require a neat display, and will be disposed somewhat in the manner of a bazaar, with a range of counters, and a walk in front. Under the whole of the hall is a range of arched cellars or vaults, having approaches in various directions. The upper court corresponds nearly with the Fish-market, but at the level of a story above it. The colonnades are here combined with shops and dwellings for resident shopkeepers. The columns, stairs, pavement, and part of the front of this important building are of granite. The total length of the building from the river to Hungerford-street, is 475 feet, and the river-front is 126 feet. The principal market for fruit, flowers, and vegetables, is Covent-garden, the buildings of which were rebuilt in 1829, after the designs of Mr Fowler. The exterior elevation of the north and south ranges is embellished with a colonnade of granite pillars, 12 feet in height, and placed at the distance of 8 feet from the shops so as to form a covered walk. The east front, which looks towards Great Russell-street, presents a colonnade about 34 feet in depth and surmounted by a terrace. Hay and straw are sold three times weekly in the Haymarket, at Whitechapel, and in Smithfield. Much of the milk used in London is supplied by cows kept within the metropolis.

Supply of Provisions, &c.—It is calculated that about 9600 cows are kept by the London cow-keepers, producing annually upwards of seven millions of gallons. Of butter about 11,000 tons, and of cheese about 13,000 are consumed annually. Of the consumption of bread it is not easy to form an accurate estimate, but that of wheat is said to average one million quarters, four-fifths of which are supposed to be consumed in bread. The supply of vegetables is chiefly drawn from the kitchen-gardens of Kent and Surrey. The extent of these is estimated at 10,000 acres, and the value of the produce annually sold at £645,000. The utmost economy is used in the cultivation of the ground, so as to obtain several crops of different vegetables from the same spot in the course of the year. Fruit is produced in great abundance by the gardens about Kensington, Hammersmith, Brentford, Twickenham, &c., which are said to be not less than 3000 acres in extent. The value of the fruit sold annually in London is said to be about £400,000. The nursery gardens in the immediate vicinity of London, extend over 1500 acres. The supply of fish is very irregular, and this article is almost always expensive. The number of vessels entered as employed in supplying London with fish a few years ago, was 3827. In the same year the following return of the supply was made. Salmon, 45,446; plaice and skate, 50,754 bushels; turbot, 87,958; fresh cod, 447,150; herrings, 3,366,407; haddocks, 482,493; sprats, 60,789 bushels; mackerel, 3,076,700; lobsters, 1,954,600; soles, 8672 bushels; whittings, 90,604; and eels, 1500 cwt. The consumption of poultry, game, and venison, is not large, in consequence of the high price of these articles. Malt liquors are consumed in great quantity. The twelve principal houses in London brew annually about 1,400,000 barrels of porter; and the quantity of ale brewed by the six principal ale-brewers is above 80,000 barrels. Besides these there are numerous smaller breweries, but it is impossible to calculate the amount of the produce. The annual consumption of coals in the metropolis is about 2,000,000 chaldrons. There is a coal-exchange in Thames-street, which is principally occupied by the great dealers, who, having a sort of monopoly of the market, the consumers have no control over it. London is well-supplied both with hard and soft water. The former is obtained from wells, which may be sunk in any place, as water exists under the whole city. The soft water is supplied by different companies, and is distributed through the metropolis in pipes of cast-iron. The New River water-works at Spa-field, derive their supply from springs at Chadwell; they supply 67,000 houses, and furnish 13,000,000 gallons daily. The East London water-works are situated at Old Ford; they supply 42,000 houses, and furnish 6,000,000 gallons daily. The West Middlesex works draw water from the Thames at Hammersmith, to the extent of 2,250,000 gallons daily, supplying 15,000 houses. The Chelsea water-works supply 12,400 houses with 1,760,000 gallons. The Grand Junction company derives its supply from the Thames near Chelsea, and serves 7700 houses, supplying daily 2,800,000 gallons. The Lambeth company draws from the Thames between Westminster and Waterloo bridges; it supplies 16,000 houses and furnishes 1,244,000 gallons daily. The Vauxhall company draws the supply of 1,000,000 gallons from the Thames near Vauxhall bridge, and serves

10,000 houses. The Southwark works draw from the middle of the Thames, between London and Southwark; about 7000 houses are supplied by these works with about 720,000 gallons daily. Some of these companies have reservoirs and filtering apparatus, but others deliver the water directly from the river.

Civil Government.—The civil government of the city is vested in the corporation, the last charter having been granted by George II. The corporation consists of the lord-mayor, two sheriffs, 26 aldermen, 240 common-councillmen, and the livery. These are assisted by a recorder, chamberlain, common sergeant, comp-troller, city remembrancer, town-clerk and other officers. The lord-mayor was originally elected by the people in general, but in 1475, the election was vested by an act of the common-council, in the mayor, aldermen, and common-councillmen, with the masters, wardens, and livery-men of the city companies. The manner of election is this:—the livery in common assembly choose two aldermen by show of hands, who are presented to the late mayor and the other aldermen, by whom one is appointed to the office of mayor. This takes place on the 29th of September. The annual revenue attached to the office is £8,000. The powers and privileges of the mayor are very extensive. On the death of the sovereign he is considered the principal officer in the kingdom, and takes his place in the privy-council till a new king is proclaimed. He is the king's representative in the civil government of the city; first commissioner in the lieutenantancy; perpetual coroner and escheator within the city and liberties of London and the borough of Southwark; chief-justice of oyer and terminer, and gaol-delivery of Newgate; judge of the court of wardmote at the election of aldermen; conservator of the rivers Thames and Medway; perpetual commissioner in all affairs relating to the river Lea; and chief butler to the king at all coronations, for which services he receives the fee of a golden cup and cover, with a golden ewer. No acts of the corporation are valid without the authority of the mayor.

The office of alderman is of high antiquity, and the name is derived from the Saxon aelder-man, expressive of mature age. The office was originally held for one year, but since the reign of Richard II. the aldermen have been appointed for life. There are 26 aldermen, or one for each ward of the city, one being elected by the free householders of each of 25 wards, and the other, namely the alderman of the ward of Bridge-without, being chosen by the aldermen themselves, generally from their own body. The lord-mayor presides at the elections, and must, if required, keep the poll open for three days. The aldermen who have filled the office of mayor are justices of the quorum; the others are justices of peace for the city, and governors of their respective wards, under the jurisdiction of the mayor. They held courts for the election of common-councillmen, and transacting the business of the ward.

The common-councillmen are the popular representatives of the wards, and are elected annually by the inhabitant householders, the alderman for the ward presiding, on St Thomas's day. Bridge-ward-without has no representatives. The numbers vary in the different wards: the following are the names with the respective numbers: Aldersgate 6, Aldgate 6, Bassishaw 4, Billingsgate 10, Bishopsgate 14, Broad-street 12, Bridge 15, Broad-street 10, Candlewick 8, Castle-Beynard 10, Cheap 12, Coleman-street 6, Cordwainers 8, Cornhill 6, Cripplegate 12, Dowgate 8, Farringdon-within 17, Farringdon-without 16, Langbourn 10, Lime-street 4, Portsoken 5, Queenhithe 6, Tower 12, Vintry 9, Walbrook 8.

The court of common-council consists of the mayor, aldermen, and common-councillmen, and regulates the funds of the corporation. It appoints committees of aldermen for certain business, and, in fact, superintends the whole civil administration of the city. This court cannot meet unless called by the lord-mayor, but he is bound to assemble a certain number during his mayoralty, and is likewise expected to call it together on a requisition.

There are two sheriffs for London and Middlesex; in the former they have separate jurisdictions, but in the affairs of the latter they are regarded as one, and no one can act without the other; even in case of the death of one, the other cannot act till a new colleague be appointed. The sheriffs are elected by the livery out of fourteen persons nominated by the mayor. Those elected are obliged to serve under heavy penalties, unless they swear that they are not worth £15,000. No alderman can be chosen mayor without having passed this office; but persons not aldermen are sometimes chosen to the shrievalty. Whoever serves is obliged to give a bond for £1,000 to the corporation as a pledge for the fulfilment of his duties.

The recorder is appointed for life, by the lord-mayor and aldermen, and receives a salary of £2,500. He must be a lawyer, and presides at the Old-Bailey and other courts.

The livery of London consists of the freemen of the different city companies, which are 91 in number, and contain upwards of 1200 individuals. About 50 of these companies have halls in different parts of the city.

Connected with the corporation of the city are some buildings which may be noticed here.

The Mansion-house is the official residence of the lord-mayor, and stands at the east end of the Poultry, on the site of the ancient Stocks-market. It was erected in 1753 after designs by Dance, at an expense of nearly £48,000. The whole structure is of an oblong form and is constructed of Portland stone. It has a magnificent but rather a heavy aspect, and loses much of its effect from the confined situation in which it is placed. A wide and lofty portico, composed of six pillars of the Corinthian order, with two pilasters at each side of the pediment, of the same order, forms the chief ornament of the front. A flight of steps ascends to the principal entrance under this portico. The pediment is adorned with a piece of sculpture, designed by Sir R. Taylor, emblematical of the wealth and grandeur of the city. The west side of the edifice presents a range of noble windows between coupled Corinthian pilasters. The interior is splendid, but many of the rooms are dark. It contains a superb ball-room and a banquet-room.

The Guildhall, or common hall of the corporation, is situated at the upper end of King-street, Cheapside. The present building was erected in 1669, on the site of a former one which had suffered severely from the fire, and of which only the interior of the porch and the walls of the hall are now remaining. The front was constructed in 1789, and is in a debased Gothic style, consisting of three divisions, separated from each other by fluted pilasters; over the centre are the arms of the city supported by dragons. This building is occupied by the chief public officers of the city. The hall, which is built and paved with stone, is a noble room of 153 feet in length, 48 in breadth, and 55 in height. It is used on occasion of great city feasts, when it can accommodate nearly 7000 persons; also for the public meetings of the livery and freemen, and for elections of members of parliament and city officers. It has two windows of stained glass representing the arms of the city and the royal arms. Under the west window are two colossal figures of wood, said to represent an ancient Briton and a Saxon, commonly called Gog and Magog. This magnificent room contains monuments erected at the expense of the city to Lord Nelson, earl of Chatham, William Pitt, and Beckford, lord-mayor of London in 1763 and 1770. The monuments of Beckford and Chatham are the work of Bacon, that of Pitt of Bubb, and that of Nelson of Smith. Over the entrance is an orchestra. In the same building are the chamberlain's office and city library. Here is also the common-council chamber, which contains some fine paintings, busts of Nelson and Wellington, and a statue of George III. by Chantrey. This room is used for the meetings of the court of aldermen.

Courts.—The courts of law belonging to the city are numerous. The lord-mayor's court is held by the lord-mayor, recorder, and aldermen, in the King's-bench, Guildhall, for trying actions for debt and trespass. The court of Hastings takes cognizance of common pleas and pleas of land. Courts of record are held by the sheriffs three times weekly. The courts of conscience and requests are held by commissioners and aldermen for debts under £5, every Wednesday and Saturday. Besides these are the court of Orphans; the Chamberlain's court; the court of pie-powder during Bartholomew fair; a court of conservancy; a court of petty-sessions, and a coroner's court. The sessions for the county are held in the Old Bailey. It is held eight times in the year by the king's commission of oyer and terminer. The judges are the lord-mayor, recorder, the aldermen who have passed the mayoralty, and the common-serjeant, who are attended by both the sheriffs, and one or more of the national judges. The offences committed in the city are tried by a jury of citizens, and those committed in the county by one formed of housekeepers in the county. There are besides, the Middlesex sessions, held at Clerkenwell, where the grand jury also sits, and the Southwark sessions at Horsemonger-lane.

The military government of the city is one of its peculiar privileges, possessed from the earliest times. Its forces consist of two regiments of militia, raised by ballot, according to an act of parliament passed in 1794, besides a regiment of light horse volunteers. The king is at liberty to order one regiment to march to any place not exceeding 12 miles from the city, the other remaining at the same time in the city.

Westminster.—The government of the city of Westminster continued under the arbitrary jurisdiction of the abbots and monks till the Reformation. It was afterwards under that of the bishop, dean, and chapter; it was next settled by 27th Elizabeth, 1585, fixing the civil government in the hands of the laity, though the nomination of the chief officers remains with the dean. The principal magistrate is the high-steward, usually a nobleman, and chosen by the dean and chapter. His post resembles that of a chancellor to a university, and is held for life. On his death or resignation, the dean takes his place till a chapter be called and a successor elected. The next great officer is the high-bailiff, who is chosen by the high-steward, to whom he pays a considerable sum for the post, which is productive of great emolument from fines and forfeitures. He holds his office for life, and has the chief management of the election of members of parliament for Westminster, and all the other bailiffs are subordinate to him. He summonses juries, and in the courts-leet sits next to the deputy steward. There are also 16 burgesses and their assistants, who exercise functions in their several wards similar to those of the aldermen of the city of London. Two of these are elected at the court-leet to act as head burgesses for the city and liberties. At the same court is chosen a high-constable, who has all the other constables under his jurisdiction. This city has no power of making freemen, it has no trading companies, nor any courts except the courts-leet, the sessions, and a court of requests.

Southwark.—This extensive portion of the metropolis was governed by its own bailiffs till 1327. In the reign of Edward VI. the borough, or town of Southwark was granted to the city of London for a pecuniary consideration. The lord-mayor acts by deputy, and appoints a steward and bailiff, the former of whom holds a court of record every Monday at St Margaret's-hill, for debts, damages, and trespasses. The liberty of the Clink is under the jurisdiction of a court of record held by the steward of the bishop of Winchester.

Suburbs.—For the suburbs, the following are the principal courts. The sheriff's court for the county of Middlesex, East Smithfield court, General and Quarter sessions, and a court of requests for the Tower Hamlets.

Police.—The police of the city is under the jurisdiction of the lord-mayor and aldermen. There are two police courts; one in the Mansion-house, where the lord-mayor presides, and one in Guildhall, where different aldermen preside in rotation. All cases occurring east of King-street are taken to the Mansion-house, all those occurring to the west, to Guildhall. The police officers of this establishment are two marshals, 8 marshalsmen, day and night patrol, and watchmen belonging to the different wards to the number of 700 or 800.

The new metropolitan police, established in 1829 by Mr Peel, are placed under a board of commissioners. It consists of eight companies, each destined for a particular district, and comprising 1 superintendent, 4 inspectors, 16 sergeants, and 144 police constables. Each officer is dressed in a blue uniform, and is furnished with a cutlass, rattle, and staff. The number employed during the night is greater than that employed in the day-time. In each division is a station, or police-office. They are named after the streets in which they stand. Bow-street, Great Marlborough-street, Hatton-garden, Worship-street, Shoreditch, Lambeth-street, Whitechapel, High-street, Mary-le-bone, Queen-square, Westminster, and Union-street, Southwark. The police magistrates are now almost universally chosen from amongst barristers, according to regulations established by Lord Sidmouth. Their salary is £600 per annum, and three are attached to each office. The Bow-street office is on the most extended scale, and the expenses in some years exceed £12,000. There are officers connected with this station who are employed in executing criminal warrants in all parts of the country. The Thames police was established in 1798, for the purpose of repressing the numerous depredations on the Thames, which had then become notorious. The superintendence of this police extends from Vauxhall to Woolwich, embracing the quays, docks, wharfs, &c. on both sides, except from the Tower-stairs to the Temple. The chief office at Wapping is never closed. Boats are kept plying on the river at night.

Ecclesiastical Affairs.—London appears anciently to have been the seat of an archbishop, but in 604 it was reduced to a bishopric, and Mellitus was the first bishop. It is situated in the province of Canterbury, but is independent of the jurisdiction of the archbishop. The ecclesiastical establishment consists of a bishop, dean, precentor, chancellor, treasurer, five archdeacons, 30 prebendaries, 12 petty canons—one of whom is sub-dean, two are styled cardinals, one is gospeller, and another epistler—six vicars choral, 10 singing men—five in orders and five laymen—10 choristers, an organist, &c. The revenues of the bishopric were valued, 26th Henry VIII., at £1207 16s. 9d. in the whole, and at £1119 8s. 1d. clear; and besides the distinct and separate revenues of the dean and other members of the chapter, their common revenues were then valued at £1485 in the whole, and at £725 7s. 10d. clear. The 12 petty canons were incorporated by Richard II.; they have a common seal, and are governed by a warden chosen from their own number.

Besides these parishes, the metropolis contains many extra-parochial places, some of which contain a considerable population. The most important are Barnard's-Inn; Bridewell-hospital and Precinct; Clifford's, Fumival's, Gray's, Lincoln's, Sergeants', and Staple Inns; White Friar's Precinct; Inner and Middle Temple; Old Artillery ground liberty; Charter-house; Ely-palace; Norton-Fulgate liberty; Rolls liberty; Tower Precinct; East Smithfield liberty; close of Westminster-abbey, and the verge of the palaces of St James and Whitehall.

The collegiate church of St Peter at Westminster, or, as it is commonly called, Westminster-abbey, was originally a Benedictine-abbey. By Henry VIII. it was converted into a college of secular canons, with a dean and bishop. The abbey was restored by Mary; but in 1560, it was again changed into a college by Queen Elizabeth, and still continues such. It consists of a dean and twelve secular canons or prebendaries.

Ecclesiastical Edifices.—Some of the ecclesiastical edifices in London deserve notice in this place; though the limits of this work make it necessary to pass over many, well-deserving of attention.

St Paul's cathedral is the chief ecclesiastical edifice in the metropolis, and the finest specimen of Italian architecture in the world, after St Peter's in Rome. It stands on an eminence to the north of the Thames, on the site of an ancient Gothic structure of great magnificence, which unfortunately perished in the great fire of 1666. After several ineffectual attempts to repair the ancient structure, it was finally demolished. The first stone of the new structure was laid on the 21st of June 1675, and the last was laid on the top of the lantern in 1710; shortly after which, the queen and both houses of parliament attended public worship in it. The whole erection was thus completed in 35 years, under one architect, Sir Christopher Wren, one master-mason, Mr Thomas Strong, and while one prelate, Dr Henry Compton, filled the see of London. "It is built of Portland stone, in the form of a Latin cross, and is divided by two rows of massy pillars, into a nave and side aisles. At the extremities of the great transept are semicircular projections for porticoes; and at the angles of the cross are square projections, which, besides containing staircases, vestries, &c., serve as buttresses of the dome. The west front toward Ludgate-street is extremely noble. The portico forming the grand entrance consists of 12 Corinthian columns, with an upper portico of eight columns of the composite order, supporting a triangular pediment. The entablature represents the history of St Paul's conversion in basso relievo, by Francis Bird. On the centre of the pediment is a statue of St. Paul, and at the side are statues of St James, St Peter, and the four evangelists. The whole rests on an elevated base, the ascent to which is formed by 22 steps of black marble." Each end of the east front is terminated by an elegant campaniel, each terminating in a dome. The south turret contains the clock, the north the belfry. At each end of the transept is a semicircular portico, formed of a dome supported by six Corinthian columns, with sculptured entablature. The east end of the church is semicircular, and ornamented with sculpture. The side walls are of rustic work, with two rows of pilasters, the lower being Corinthian, the upper composite. The dome, which is the principal feature of the building, rises from the intersection of the cross; the lower part is surrounded by 32 columns surmounted by a balustrade and range of Attic autes, on which rests the proper dome, surmounted by a lantern with a ball and cross. The whole building is surrounded by a cast-iron balustrade, weighing 200 tons, and erected on a low stone wall, at an expense of £11,000. Within the inclosure in front is a statue of Queen Anne, by Bird.

The interior is remarkably imposing, and not the less so from its wanting all that superfluity of ornament and gilding, so often to be met with in Italian churches. The pavement is formed of alternate slabs of black and white marble, and the interior of the dome is ornamented with flags taken in war. The walls are to a certain extent ornamented with monuments to illustrious men, executed by the sculptors of the highest merit. Among these may be named the monument to Lord Nelson, by Flaxman; Earl Howe, by Flaxman; Sir Ralph Abercromby, by Westmacott; Sir John Moore, by Bacon, &c. Lord Nelson lies in the vault immediately beneath the centre of the dome, and Sir Christopher Wren is interred under the entrance to the choir, on the great arch of which is the inscription, terminating with the words, "si monumentum queris, circumspice!" The choir is divided from the body of the church by the organ gallery, which rests on eight beautiful Corinthian pillars. This, as well as the rest of the choir, presents much carving in wood, the work of the celebrated Gibbons. The choral service is performed here twice a-day. The whole length of the cathedral is 500 feet; the extreme breadth at the transept, 285; the height of the top of the cross from the floor of the vaults, 404 feet.

The ecclesiastical structure next in importance to St Paul's cathedral, is Westminster-abbey. The oldest part of the present building was erected in the reign of Edward the Confessor, on the site of an older structure. A large part was built by Henry III., who added a chapel to the Virgin, and the beautiful chapel, also dedicated to the Virgin, was erected in 1502, by Henry VII. In the end of the 17th century, the whole was repaired under the direction of Sir Christopher Wren, who completed the western front by the erection of the towers. The finest entrance is that into the north limb of the transept. The appearance of the interior is commanding, and from the western entrance a view of the whole is obtained at once. The Gothic arches which separate the nave from the side aisles, are supported by 48 pillars of grey marble. The choir was constructed at a very recent date. On the north side are the monuments of Aymer de Valence, Earl of Pembroke and his countess, and of Edmund Crouchback, Earl of Lancaster. On the south side are those of Sebert, the reputed founder of the ancient abbey, and of Anne of Cleves. The modern marble altar-piece, which was designed for the royal chapel at Whitehall, by Sir C. Wren, and presented to the abbey by Queen Anne, has been removed, and the ancient one has been as far as possible restored. In front of the altar is a curious mosaic pavement, said to have been executed by Richard de Ware, abbot of Westminster. Along the walls of the nave and transepts are numerous monuments to various celebrated individuals. In this abbey are ten chapels. Edward the Confessor's chapel is situated at the east end of the choir, immediately behind the altar. It contains the now much dilapidated, but once splendid work of Pietro Cavallini, the shrine of Edward the Confessor, erected by order of Henry III. Here are the tombs of Editha, consort of the Confessor, of Henry III., Edward I., Richard II. and his queen, and a small chantry chapel of great beauty, containing the tomb of Henry V. Here are kept also the coronation chairs, one of which contains the stone which Edward I. brought from Scone, in 1297. Henry VII.'s chapel was erected by the monarch whose name it bears, in 1502 and succeeding years. The name of the architect is not certainly known. The whole is in the later style of architecture, and is the most beautiful specimen in existence. It is dedicated to the Virgin, and the sum of £14,000 was expended on its erection. The exterior is unusually rich and varied, and is adorned with crocheted turrets, rising from the buttresses and ornamented with a profusion of sculpture. The entrance is from the east end of the abbey, under a stately arch; and the ascent is by a flight of steps of black marble. At the entrance are curiously formed gates of brass. Along the sides of the nave are the stalls of the knights of the bath. These are constructed of oak with Gothic canopies, and under each seat is the seat of the esquires of whom each knight has three, whose arms and designations are engraved on plates of brass. Above each stall hang the banner, sword, and helmet of the knight. The carving on these stalls is very minute and of a grotesque character. The roof of the chapel is nearly flat and is supported on arches between the nave and side aisles, which turn upon 12 stately Gothic pillars, curiously adorned with figures, fruit, and foliage. The whole ceiling is of stone, most elaborately carved, with exquisite fan-work and pendants. In the centre of the chapel stands the tomb of Henry VII., who erected it as a royal sepulchral chapel, in which none but those of royal blood were to be interred. The tomb is adorned with many devices alluding to his family and alliances, and is constructed of a basaltic stone, from the designs of Torregiano. Among the illustrious persons whose monuments are seen here, may be mentioned Queen Elizabeth, Edward V., Charles II., William III. and Mary his consort, Queen Anne, and Prince George.

One of the most interesting structures in London is the Temple-church. The age of this building is not certainly known, but it is probable that it was erected about 1185, when Heraclitus, the patriarch of Jerusalem, dedicated it to the Virgin. The oldest portions now remaining are at the western end, where there is a circular edifice with Norman windows. The body, or eastern part of the church, appears to have been built about 1240, and here the arches are pointed. The whole appears to have been formed on the model of the Basilica, or metropolitan temple of Jerusalem. The entrance is through a superb Norman porch. This church very nearly fell a sacrifice to the great fire in 1666, and suffered much by fire in 1695. It has since been completely repaired. The church contains many sepulchral monuments; but the most remarkable are a number of stone figures, disposed in two groupes of five each. Five of these figures are cross-legged, from which they are commonly regarded as the effigies of warriors who had fought with the infidels in the holy land. These figures are supposed to have been collected from various places, and to have been laid together in their present positions long after the death of the persons whom they represent. Antiquaries have formed various conjectures with regard to the individuals for whom these figures are intended, but they have not been able to offer any thing on the subject beyond mere conjecture.

Stepney Old church, dedicated to St Dunstan, is a curious Gothic structure, erected about the 14th century. It contains a remarkable font of high antiquity, and in the wall of the western porch is a stone with an inscription purporting that it came from Carthage, and once formed part of its walls.—St Martin's-in-the-fields, in St Martin's-lane, is an elegant structure in the Grecian style of architecture. It was founded in 1721, and designed by Gibbs, and is thought to stand a comparison with the best works of Sir Christopher Wren, after St Paul's cathedral. The expense of the structure was £37,000, to which the king added £1,500 for the purchase of an organ. The portico is greatly admired, but is not in correct taste, the pillars, which are six in number, being placed too far distant from each other. The interior is elegant; the roof is arched and supported by Corinthian columns.

St Margaret's church, New Palace-yard, is an elegant Gothic structure, near Westminster abbey. It was erected in the reign of Edward I., but has been considerably altered by repairs. Over the altar-table is a fine basso-relievo, representing Christ and the disciples at Emmaus. In the composition are some strange incongruities; one of the disciples is dressed like a Roman Catholic friar, and from his shoulders hangs a cardinal's hat; behind the other stands a page in Italian costume, with a hat and feathers!

Here is a superb painted window, executed at Dort in Holland, for Henry VII. It represents the crucifixion. In one of the side aisles is interred Sir Walter Raleigh.

St Stephen's, Walbrook; the interior of this church is regarded as the masterpiece of Sir C. Wren, and is said to excel every modern structure in proportion and elegance. The plan is chaste and beautiful; the dome, supported by eight arches, springing from eight single columns, is wonderfully light and scenic in its effect. Over the altar is a fine picture by West, representing the interment of St Stephen.

St Helen's Bishopsgate-street, is one of the few churches which escaped the great fire. It is remarkable for several monuments, among which are those of Sir Thomas Gresham, who founded the Exchange, and Hook the astronomer.

St Dunstan's in the East is remarkable for its beautiful Gothic spire, said to have been designed by a daughter of Sir C. Wren.

Besides the parish churches there are 64 Episcopal chapels, 15 Roman Catholic chapels, exclusive of those in the adjoining villages, 6 Jewish synagogues, 6 Quakers' meeting houses, Arminian, Danish, Dutch, French, German, Swiss, and Swedish Protestant chapels, 3 Arian chapels, 43 Baptist, 95 Calvinist, 1 of Free-thinkers, 3 of Lady Huntingdon's connexion, 2 Huntingtonian, 1 Moravian, 3 Swedenborgian, 1 Sandemanian, 7 Unitarian, 18 Methodist.

Commerce of London.—The first branch of the commerce of London is that connected with the port, the foreign and coasting trade, both imports and exports. This is beyond doubt the most extensive in the world, and has increased with unexampled rapidity. The following statement of progress within the last 130 years, will suffice to give a general idea of its extent; it is quoted from a little work entitled 'Leigh's New Picture of London.'—"The number of vessels belonging to the port of London in 1701, amounted to 560, carrying 84,882 tons, and 10,065 men. In 1710 the customs of the city are stated at £1,268,095, and those of all the outports at only £346,081.

"During the reign of George I., the trade of London made little if any progress, owing to the South-sea scheme, the Scottish rebellion, and the Spanish war; but in 1732 commerce began to revive; its advances, however, were comparatively slow till the peace of Aix-la-Chapelle, in 1748, after which it extended with uncommon rapidity. The next check it sustained was occasioned by the American war. But no sooner was peace signed, than it proceeded with renewed vigour; for, so early as 1784, the value of exports to America only had increased to £3,397,500, considerably above the greatest amount in any year before the war. The nett sum of duties levied in the port of London, and paid into the exchequer, this year, rose to the vast sum of £4,472,091. From this period, to 1790, the commerce of London continued uniformly increasing. In that year, however, in consequence of the commencement of the war, the value of exports was upwards of £2,000,000 less than the preceding year, though the imports scarcely suffered any diminution. Numerous bankruptcies consequently took place, but the timely interference of the legislature, and the voting of exchequer bills to the amount of £3,000,000, for the use of such persons as could give sufficient security, soon checked the growing distress.

"In the course of the three succeeding years the appearance of things was entirely changed. In 1796 the exports of London amounted in value to £18,410,499, and the imports to £14,719,466. The number of British ships that entered the port amounted to 2007, carrying 436,843 tons; and 2169 foreign vessels, carrying 287,142 tons. The total entering coast-wise was 11,176, including repeated voyages, which made a tonnage of 1,059,915. The following year, some alarm was spread among the merchants by the stoppage of bank payments in specie; but, through the intervention of parliament, confidence was soon restored. The nett amount of the customs was £3,950,608. In 1798, the importation of sugar and rum far exceeded those of any preceding year, as did likewise the revenue of the customs, which amounted to the sum of £5,321,187; in 1799, it had increased to £7,526,353, West India 4½ per cent. duty included; but next year it fell to £6,468,655. The official value of the imports in 1800 was £18,843,172, and of the exports £25,428,922, of which £13,272,494 was in British merchandise. Their real value exceeded £68,000,000, nearly two-thirds of the value of the trade of the whole kingdom. The number of vessels belonging to the port in that year was 2666, carrying 568,268 tons, and 41,402 men. Comparing this with the numbers returned in the beginning of last century, the increase is truly astonishing. On the quantity of tonnage it is nearly in the proportion of six to one, and on the amount of men and ships upwards of four to one. The East India Company's ships alone, carry more burden, by 21,166 tons, than all the vessels of London did a century ago. In 1806, the value of the imports and exports of London was £36,527,000; in 1819, £46,935,000; and in 1825 it was increased to £96,936,000; and in the year ending January, 1829, to £107,772,805. The number of coasters which entered the port in 1814 was 15,139; in 1821, 18,915; in 1827, 17,677. Of vessels employed in the foreign trade there were 4012 British and 1534 foreign. The number of steam vessels connected with the port of London is about 50. Besides the seamen employed to man these vessels, there are thousands of labourers engaged in loading and unloading, and in navigating the boats and craft."

Port.—The port of London, so far as it is under the jurisdiction of the corporation, reaches on the Kent side to Gravesend, and on the Essex side to the boundary-stone a little above Southend; but in the legal acceptance of the term it extends from the North Foreland in Kent, and Shoeberry-Ness in Essex, to London bridge. As actually occupied by shipping, it extends from London-bridge to Deptford, a distance of four miles. It is divided into the upper, middle, and lower pools, with a space below extending to Deptford. The upper-pool is about 1600 yards in length, and extends from London-bridge to Union-hole; the middle-pool, 700 yards long, extends downwards to Wapping-New-stairs; the lower-pool, 1800 yards in length, to the Horseferry-tier, near Limehouse, and the space below, extending to Deptford, is about 2700 yards long. The average breadth is from 400 to 500 yards. Vessels of any burden can ascend the river to Deptford; the lower-pool admits vessels of 400 tons, the upper those of 200, and large barges can sail nearly 130 miles above London-bridge. The tide flows up about 80 miles from the mouth of the Thames, but the water is not salt above Gravesend. The spring-tides rise about 18 or 20 feet, the neap-tides 12 or 14.

Docks.—The wharfs and quays along the banks of the river having been found utterly inadequate to the purposes of commerce, the first proposal for the formation of docks was made in 1795, the plans and estimates for which were laid before a general meeting of merchants, and unanimously approved of, and in a few hours a subscription of £800,000 was filled up for carrying the same into execution. The West India docks were begun in 1800, and completed in two years. They are situated in the Isle of Dogs, across the narrowest part of which they extend, and communicate with the river at both ends, at Blackwall and at Limehouse. The docks are two in number: the northern one, which extends over 30 acres, and can accommodate 300 vessels, is intended for vessels arrived from the West Indies; the southern one, for loading outward-bound ships, covers 24 acres, and accommodates upwards of 200 vessels. The length of each is 2600 feet. An open shed, along the whole length of the quays in front of the warehouses, receives the cargoes; the goods are hoisted up to the different floors by means of cranes. These warehouses can contain the whole West Indian imports. By an act of parliament, all West India produce imported into London must be unloaded here. The company has a capital of £1,100,000, and the proprietors are paid an interest which is fixed by law at a maximum of 10 per cent., which the trade of the company has hitherto enabled them to pay. The canal to the south of the West India docks, which was cut to enable vessels to avoid the circuitous navigation, has not been much used for that purpose, and has been sold by the corporation to the West India dock company a few years ago.

The East India docks were founded in 1803, and completed in 1806. The Brunswick dock, at Blackwall, originally formed by Mr Perry, was purchased for the outward-bound shipping, and enlarged to the extent of 9½ acres. In addition, a new dock of 18 acres was dug for the discharge of the cargoes of homeward-bound vessels. The management of these docks is in the hands of the East India company, and all East Indian produce entering the port of London must be discharged here.

The London docks, which are situated between Ratcliffe-highway and the Thames, were begun in 1802 and completed in 1805. There are two docks, one of 20 and the other of 14 acres, with basins for small craft. The capital of the company is £2,200,000. Here are extensive tobacco warehouses, covering 4 acres of ground, for which government pays a rent to the proprietors of £15,600 annually.

St Catherine's docks, which are situated between the London docks and the Tower, were opened in 1828. Eleven acres are covered by the wet docks, and 13 are occupied by the warehouses and quays. The cost was not less than £2,000,000.

It is proposed to form a dock for collier vessels at Bermondsey, thus leaving the river free from an encumbrance of which the owners of large trading vessels have long complained.

Inland Trade.—The inland communication of London with the interior, is accomplished partly by means of the river Thames, partly by the public roads, and partly by canals. The canals are the Paddington, the Regent's, and the Grand Surrey. The first and second communicate with the Grand Junction, leading into Lancashire and Yorkshire; the Surrey canal passes merely from Camberwell to Rotherhithe. It is supposed that the limited nature of the inland navigation of London arises from the prohibition to import coals through this channel. It is impossible to calculate the value of the inland commerce.

Manufactures.—“The manufactures of London are very various, and some of them are carried on on a most extensive scale. The southern banks of the river, for a considerable extent, are covered with manufactories, such as iron-founders, dyers, soap and oil makers, glass-makers, distillers, hat-makers, &c. The other principal manufactures consist chiefly of fine goods and articles of elegant use, such as cutlery, jewellery, gold and silver plate, japan ware, cut glass, cabinet work, carriages, &c. The breweries, ship-building yards, oil-cloth, and paper-hanging manufactories, vinegar and chemical works are also on a large scale; but the manufactures that employ the greatest number of men, are the silk manufactures in Spitalfields, and the watch manufactory in Clerkenwell, each of which employ, when trade is brisk, about 700 persons. The retail trade is immense. This will clearly appear, when we reflect that the population of London is upwards of a million and a half; that the strangers who are constantly in the metropolis are very numerous, and are always purchasers to a large amount; and that there are two sets of streets running almost parallel nearly the whole extent of London, from east to west, which, with very few exceptions, form a line of shops; the one lying to the south, near the river, extends from Mile-end to Parliament-street, more than three miles in length, including Whitechapel, Leadenhall-street, Cornhill, Cheapside, St Paul's church-yard, Ludgate-street, Fleet-street, the Strand, and Charing-cross. The northern line, which extends about four miles, reaches from Shoreditch church almost to the end of Oxford-street. There are, besides, other streets, not in either of these lines, which contain many large shops, such as Fenchurch and Gracechurch-streets in the city, Cockspur-street, Pall-Mall, St James's-street, the Hay-market, Piccadilly, Bond-street, Regent-street, &c., at the west end of the town.”

Public Buildings connected with Commerce.—The Bank of England. This is a heavy piece of Grecian architecture, fronting Threadneedle-street, and facing also Lothbury, Bartholomew-lane, and Princes-street. The centre of the principal, or south front, the hall, the bullion-court, and court-yard, were designed and erected in 1732, by George Sampson; the lateral wings of this façade, and the returns on the east and west sides, with several offices immediately attached, were built by Sir Robert Taylor, between 1770 and 1786, since which time the remainder of the building has been constructed by Mr Soane. The whole exterior has also been remodelled by the last named architect. The form of the area is irregular; its south front measures 365 feet in length; the west, 440; the north, 410; and the east, 245. There are eight open courts. The interior is in much better architectural taste than the exterior. For example—the entrance to the bullion court is copied from the arch of Constantine, and the chief cashier's office from the temple of the sun and moon at Rome.

The Royal Exchange, situated on the northern side of Cornhill, was erected in 1668, at an expense of £80,000, by Mr N. Hawksmoor, a pupil of Sir Christopher Wren. It occupies an area of 203 feet by 171, on the site of the former exchange, built by Sir Thomas Gresham, which was destroyed in the great fire. The principal front faces Cornhill. In the centre is the grand entrance, and a piazza extends along the front. On each side of the entrance are Corinthian demi-columns, supporting an architrave, without pediment. In the inter-columnar space on each side is a niche, with well-executed statues of Charles I. and II., in Roman costume. On the entablature are the royal arms in relief. On each side of the entrance is a row of windows placed between demi-columns and pilasters of the composite order, and above all is a balustrade. Above the principal entrance rises a tower, 72 feet in height, erected in 1821, after the design of Mr G. Smith. It consists of a square story, an octagon, and a circular story of eight Grecian columns, surmounted by a vane in the form of a gilt grasshopper, the crest of Sir T. Gresham's arms. This tower is ornamented with various statues, emblematical figures, and reliefs. The north front, which faces Threadneedle-street, is very plain. The inside of the area is surrounded with piazzas, supporting a curiously ornamented entablature. Here are the arms of the king, the city, Sir Thomas Gresham, and the mercers' company; and 24 niches, 20 of which contain statues of the kings and queens of England, from Edward I. to George III., with a few exceptions; these were the work of G. Cibber, Rysbrach, and Wilton. Under the piazzas are 28 niches, only two of which are filled, with the statues of Sir T. Gresham and Sir John Barnard. In the centre of the area is a statue of Charles II., by Gibbons. The exchange is open daily from 8 in the morning to half-past 4 afternoon, but is most frequented from 1 to 4 o'clock. In the galleries above are the Royal exchange, Assurance office, Lloyd's coffee-house, &c.

The East India house, in Leadenhall-street, contains the offices of the East India company. The building was originally founded in 1726, but was completely remodelled and enlarged in 1796, under the superintendence of Mr Jupp. The front, which is of stone, and about 200 feet in length, is in the Grecian style of architecture, and in the centre is a portico, rising to the full height of the building, supported on six fluted Ionic columns. The frieze is ornamented with sculpture, and an emblematical groupe of figures in alto-relievo adorns the pediment. The basement windows are arched, those of the principal story square, and a handsome balustrade surmounts the whole. In the anterior are several noble rooms, containing many paintings and sculptures. The grand court-room, the sale-rooms, the library, and the museum, are particularly worthy of notice. The last may be visited by strangers, who obtain tickets from any director.

The Trinity-house, on Tower-hill, was erected in 1793, under the direction of Mr S. Wyatt. It is constructed of Portland stone, in the Grecian style, with a rustic basement. It is ornamented with busts and reliefs. In the interior are some good pictures and various naval curiosities. The corporation of the Trinity-house is the guardian of the interests of British shipping in general. They examine such children as are educated for the sea in Christ's hospital, and the masters of king's ships; they also appoint pilots for the Thames, settle the rate of pilotage, &c.

The Custom-house, which stands in Lower Thames-street and fronts the river, was founded in 1813, and first opened for public business in 1817. The river front consists of a central division and two wings, each of which has a central colonnade of the Ionic order, resting on a rustic basement, and supporting an architrave, which in the centre is surmounted by a balustrade, and in the wings by attic stories. The central portion was rebuilt in 1825, the foundations having previously been found insecure. In this is the long-room, 186 feet by 60. The whole length of the building is 480 feet, and the breadth 100. During the erection of this structure the old custom-house was burnt to the ground, in 1814.

The Excise-office, in Broad-street, was founded in 1763, on the site of Gresham college. It is a handsome structure of considerable extent, and well adapted for the purposes for which it was erected.

The Auction-mart, in Bartholomew-lane, is a handsome stone structure, erected in 1809, under the superintendence of Mr John Walters. The interior contains a spacious saloon for the exhibition of particulars of sales of every description; various apartments for auctions; office-room, &c.

Commercial-hall, in Mincing-lane, is an elegant structure, built in 1811, after designs by Mr Woods. In front is a portico of six Ionic columns, ornamented with some emblematical reliefs. The interior contains show and sale-rooms, for the exhibition and sale of colonial produce, as well as a large coffee-room, and various private counting-houses.

The Corn Exchange, in Mark-lane, is a neat structure, with a Doric portico, and forming a colonnade about a quadrangular court. Under the colonnade are seats and tables for the corn-dealers. In the entrance building are two coffee-houses.

Immediately adjoining this is the New Corn Exchange. This was erected in 1828, and is a handsome Grecian structure, well adapted for the accommodation of the merchants.

The Stock Exchange is situated at the upper end of Capel-street, close to the Bank. It was erected in 1801, stock-jobbers having previously transacted business in the Bank Rotunda. Regular stock-brokers alone are allowed to transact business here.

The South Sea House, in which the affairs of the South Sea company are transacted, is a handsome Doric edifice in Threadneedle-street. In the interior is a square court, surrounded by a piazza of Tuscan pillars.

"The General Post-office was originally established in Cloak-lane, near Dowgate-hill, whence it was removed to the Black-Swan in Bishopsgate-street. On occasion of the great fire in 1666, it was removed to Brydges-street, Covent-garden, and afterwards to Lombard-street, where it continued to September 23d, 1829, when it was removed to its present situation on the site of an ancient college and sanctuary in St Martin's-le-Grand. This magnificent building was begun in 1825, from designs by R. Smirke, Esq., and completed in 1829. It is of the Ionic order. The basement is of granite, but the building is of brick, faced with Portland stone. It is 400 feet in length and 80 in depth. In the centre of the front is a portico, consisting of six columns of Portland stone, resting on pedestals of granite. The vestibule, or great hall, occupying the centre of the building, forms a public thoroughfare from St-Martin's-le-Grand to Foster-lane. This hall is 80 feet long, 60 broad, and 53 in height. On the north side of this hall are the receiving-rooms for newspapers, inland and ship letters, behind which are rooms for the letter-sorters and carriers. The mails are taken in at the eastern door. On the south side are the offices of the receiver-general and accountant, also the foreign letter office. At the east end is the two-penny post-offices, with rooms for receivers, sorters, and carriers. In the upper rows are apartments in which the foreign clerks reside. The basement story is fire-proof. It contains the rooms of the mail-coach guards, and offices for the servants, with an armoury. The whole building is lighted with gas. According to a calculation made in May, 1828, it appears that the average number of letters, brought daily into the London office by 24 mails, was 28,466, or 8,681,704 in the course of a year. The two-penny post, for the conveyance of letters within three miles of the general post-office, is only a branch of the latter. There are many receiving offices scattered about town, and the number of letters sent daily through this medium is calculated at 40,000. There are six collections and deliveries in town daily, Sundays excepted.

Offices of Government and other Public Buildings.—The House of Lords, in Old Palace-yard, is a plain building, with a front in the Gothic style, designed by Mr James Wyatt. The interior of the house is ornamented with tapestry, representing the victory over the Spanish armada. The chamber in which the peers meet is oblong, and rather less than that of the House of Commons. The throne, which was erected in 1820, has a superb canopy of crimson velvet, surmounted by an imperial crown, and supported by two columns, richly gilt and adorned with oak leaves and acorns. In the same building is the celebrated star chamber.—The House of Commons is connected with the House of Lords by a Gothic colonnade. The room in which the assemblies of the commons are held, was formerly called St Stephen's chapel, having been erected by King Stephen. It was rebuilt by Edward III., in 1347, and by him made a collegiate church, to which a dean and 12 secular priests were appointed. There still remains a beautiful Gothic window in the west front. There are galleries on each side of the room for the use of the members, and a small gallery at the end, for the accommodation of strangers. The speaker's chair stands at some distance from the wall, and is surmounted with the royal arms. The seat on the floor, on the right hand of the speaker is called the Treasury Bench, because some of the members of administration usually sit there. The side immediately opposite is occupied by the leading members of the opposition. Beneath the House of Commons, in passages or apartments appropriated to various uses, are considerable remains of an under chapel of curious workmanship, and a side of a cloister, the roof of which is scarcely surpassed by the exquisite beauty and richness of Henry VII.'s chapel in the neighbouring abbey.

The Horse-guards, in Whitehall, is the office of the commander-in-chief of the army, and is so called from being the station where his majesty's guards do duty.

The Treasury, in St James's-park, close to Whitehall, is a handsome Grecian structure, planned by Kent, in which the treasury-board meets.

The Council-office, Whitehall, was erected after the designs of Mr Soane, in 1826. It is an oblong rectangular structure, projecting at both ends, and surrounded with Corinthian pillars. These support an entablature and balustrade, above which is an attic story, also surmounted by a stone balustrade. The Corinthian columns are copied from the temple of Jupiter Stator. In the west end is the council-chamber, a magnificent apartment, occupying the whole height of the edifice. The sides are ornamented with Ionic pillars in scagliola. In this splendid room his majesty's privy council meets to hear appeals from the subordinate tribunals of the East and West Indies.

The Admiralty-office, Whitehall, is a large structure of brick and stone, erected on the site of Wallingford-house. The front has two deep wings, and a lofty Ionic portico. Here are the chambers for transacting the business of the admiralty, as well as handsome residences for seven of the commissioners.

Somerset-house, Strand, is situated on the site of an older structure, erected in 1549 by the protector Somerset. In succeeding years, Somerset-house became the residence of various queens. Elizabeth, Anne of Denmark, and the consorts of Charles I. and II. resided here. The old structure presented a curious mixture of Grecian and Gothic architecture, and was pulled down in 1774, to make room for the erection of a spacious building for certain government offices. The designs were made by Sir William Chambers, and the centre and west wing were early completed, but the east wing was wanting till 1829, when it was begun for the new establishment for education called King's college. "Somerset-house, occupying a space about 800 feet in width, and 500 in depth, is built in the form of a quadrangle, with a large court in the centre. The Strand front consists of a rustic basement of nine arches, supporting Corinthian columns, surmounted in the centre by an attic, and at the extremities by a balustrade. The key-stones of the arches are adorned with colossal masks in alto-relievo, emblematical of Ocean and the eight principal rivers of England. On the three central windows of the first floor are medallions in bas-relief of George III., his queen, and the prince of Wales. The attic is divided into three parts by four statues of venerable men, representations of Justice, Truth, Valour, and Moderation. The whole is surmounted by the British arms, supported by Fame the genius of England. The three central arches of the basement form the entrance of the vestibule, in which are two busts, by Wilton, of Michael Angelo and Sir I. Newton. In the court, opposite the entrance, is a bronze cast of the Thames, by Bacon, lying at the foot of a pedestal, on which is a statue of George III. Before the river front, is a spacious terrace commanding a magnificent view of the metropolis and river, raised on rustic arches, ornamented with a colossal mask on the Thames in alto-relievo." The principal departments of government which are carried on here, are the stamp-office, the victualling-office, the audit-office, and the navy-office. The front towards the Strand contains the apartments allotted to the Royal Society, the Society of Antiquaries, the Geological Society, and the Royal Academy of Arts.

The Mint is a handsome Grecian structure, on Tower-hill. The front is adorned with columns and pilasters, and consists of three stories, having a centre and wings, the centre being surmounted by a pediment, the remainder by a balustrade. The architect was Mr Smirke, Jun.

The Tower of London is situated on the north bank of the Thames, at the eastern extremity of the city. The origin of the building is involved in great doubt, but it is generally believed that the oldest part of the structure now in existence, was constructed under the direction of William the Conqueror. The whole structure is surrounded by a ditch, and is separated from the Thames by a platform. The exterior circuit of the ditch is 3156 feet. "The ditch, of very considerable width and depth, proceeds northward on each side of the fortress, nearly in a parallel line, and meets in a semi-circle; the slope is faced with brick, and the great wall has been repaired with that material so frequently, that it might almost be disputed whether any part of it but the turrets had ever been stone. Cannon are planted at intervals round the line, and command every avenue leading to Tower-hill. The ditch is much neglected, and contains but little water. The interior of the wall is lined with houses, to the evident injury of the place as a fortress." The principal buildings within the walls are the following:—The church called St Peter ad Vincula, in which have been interred the bodies of many persons beheaded in the Tower; the White Tower, which is considered the oldest part of the structure, and is the most prominent building in the Tower; the walls are eleven feet in thickness, and it contains the sea and minstrel armouries, as also the chapel of St John, a curious specimen of Gothic architecture, now used as a depository for some of the records; the office of the keeper of the records, containing all the rolls from the time of King John to that of Richard III.; the jewel-office, a strong stone room, in which the crown jewels are preserved; the horse armoury, in which are suits of armour of various dates, from 1272 to 1685, attributed to various celebrated personages; the grand storehouse, containing the small armoury, &c.; the Spanish or Asiatic armoury; the Beauchamp tower, in which many celebrated state prisoners have been confined, and the Lion's tower, built by Edward IV.; in which the menagerie is kept. The Tower is governed by a constable, usually a man of high rank, who has under him a lieutenant and deputy-lieutenant, the latter of whom has the title of governor, and resides in the Tower.

Courts of Law.—The great courts of judicature are the courts of chancery, of exchequer, or king's bench, and of common pleas. The court of chancery is the highest court of judicature in the kingdom, after the parliament. During term time, the lord-chancellor sits in Westminster-hall, during the vacation in Lincoln's-inn-hall. These courts are open to the public. The court in Westminster is a spacious square room, having a handsome circular gallery for the accommodation of students and suitors. It is surmounted by a dome, through each side of which the light is admitted by a large circular window. The vice-chancellor sits in a court at Lincoln's-inn, and sometimes in Westminster-hall. The master of the rolls, who is keeper of the records of these courts, has also a court in which cases of equity are decided. He sits in a room adjoining the Rolls chapel in Chancery-lane.

The court of exchequer, the judges of which are styled barons, has the power of trying causes both in law and equity. All matters relating to the king's revenue, treasury, customs, and fines, are within its jurisdiction. The records of this court are of high value.

The court of king's bench is the supreme court of common law, and is so called from its proceedings always being supposed to be conducted in presence of the king. It was wont to be held in any palace in which the king happened to be actually residing, but it has been fixed at Westminster, as an ancient royal palace. The court likewise sits at certain periods in the court-room at Guildhall. The court of common-pleas is also a king's court. Its jurisdiction extends over all England, and it takes cognizance of pleas between subject and subject, but not of pleas of the crown, as the king's bench has. This court sits at Westminster, and one of the judges goes, after term, to Guildhall in the city, to hear nisi prius causes. Westminster-hall, in which these courts are held, was originally erected by William Rufus, and was used as a banqueting house. Having fallen into a state of great dilapidation, it was repaired and altered by Richard II., in 1397. It was first called the New-hall Palace, to distinguish it from the Old Palace at the south end. Westminster-hall is one of the largest rooms in Europe unsupported by pillars; its length is 270 feet, its height 90, and its breadth 74. The roof consists chiefly of cheamut wood, most curiously constructed, in a fine Gothic style. It is everywhere adorned with angels supporting the arms of Richard II. and Edward the Confessor, as is the stone-moulding that runs round the hall, with the hart couchant under a tree and other devices of the former monarch. Parliaments often sat in this hall, which has likewise been used for the trial of peers and other distinguished persons, and for the banqueting room at the coronation of the kings of England. At each extremity is a fine Gothic window. The front is partly in the florid style of English architecture, highly ornamented with sculpture.

Other courts of law are, the exchequer chamber, which is merely a court of appeal, held by the lord-chancellor, lord-treasurer, and judges of the king's bench and common-pleas; the court of admiralty, which takes cognizance of all crimes committed on the high seas, or on rivers below the first bridge next the sea; the court of arches, and the prerogative court, held in Doctors commons, for the trial of ecclesiastical, and certain classes of civil causes; the insolvent debtors court, which is held by three commissioners, in a neat building, erected in 1824, in Portugal-street, Lincoln's-Inn-Fields, after designs by Mr Soane; the Palace or Marshalsea court, which decides all civil suits within twelve miles of the king's palace, except in the city, or regarding the affairs of any of the king's household.

Inns of court.—These are institutions in which the professors of the law originally lived and were educated. At present no form of education is carried on, mere residence alone being required to qualify a person to be called to the bar. These inns are governed by masters, principals, benchers, stewards, &c., who have the power of excluding from the common-table, or even of expelling from the society such persons as are found guilty of certain offences. The principal inns of court are the Inner and Middle Temple, Lincoln's, and Gray's Inn. The temple was anciently the dwelling of the knights' templars. The principal entrance is by Middle Temple gate, a short distance within Temple-Bar. The Inner Temple stands off the east of the entrance, and has a cloister and a large garden. The society consists of benchers, barristers and students. The Middle Temple joins the Inner Temple on the west, and is chiefly remarkable for its hall, which contains an ancient carved screen, a picture of Charles I. by Vandyke, and portraits of Charles II., Queen Anne, George I. and George II. The church of the Temple has already been described. Lincoln's-Inn, so called from its occupying the site of a mansion of Henry de Lacy, earl of Lincoln, in the reign of Edward I., stands between Chancery-lane and Lincoln's-inn-square. The chapel, which forms one side of the quadrangle, was erected in 1620, after designs by Inigo Jones. The hall is a handsome room in the Gothic style, the windows of which are adorned with painted glass. It contains Hogarth's painting of Paul before Felix. The gateway in Chancery-lane is of brick, and was erected in the reign of Henry VII. by Sir Thomas Lovell. Gray's-Inn is in Holborn; it receives this name from its having been the residence of the ancient family of Gray of Wilton, by whom it was bequeathed to students of the law, in the reign of Edward III. The spacious garden connected with this is open to the public. The hall contains a curious screen of carved oak, and portraits of Charles I. and II., James II., and Lord Raymond. The Inns of Chancery are chiefly occupied by attorneys and solicitors. They are Clement's, Thavies', Clifford's, Staple, Lyon's, Furnival's, Barnard's, Symond's, and New Inns. There are two Sergeants' Inns; one in Fleet-street and the other in Chancery-lane.

Prisons.—The prisons of the metropolis are: for criminals, Newgate, Cold-bath-fields, Millbank penitentiary, New prison at Clerkenwell, Tothill fields, Bridewell, and Surrey county gaol; for debtors, Giltspur-street compter, the Fleet, the Marshalsea, Borough compter, King's-Bench, and the Debtors' prison.

Establishments for Education.—The London university was instituted in 1825, and the first stone was laid by the duke of Sussex, 30th April, 1827. The capital proposed to be raised by the shareholders is from £150,000 to £300,000, in shares of £100. The subscribers expect to be recompensed by the fund formed by fees taken from pupils, and in part by the privilege of recommending pupils at a lower rate of entry. The building was opened for lectures on October 1st, 1828. There are professors of Languages, Mathematics, Physics, Moral Philosophy, and the sciences connected with it, Law, History, Political economy, and the Medical sciences. Hitherto the success of the school has not equalled the expectations that were raised, but there cannot be a doubt of its ultimate prosperity. Its affairs are managed by a council, elected biennially by the shareholders. The building, which is in the Grecian style, was designed by Mr Wilkins.—King's college was founded shortly after the above, chiefly with the view of uniting a religious education in conformity with the doctrines of the church of England with the other branches. The building forms the east wing of Somerset-house. The estimated expense of the whole is £170,000. The archbishop of Canterbury is perpetual visitor.

The Charter-house, so called from its position on the site of a convent of Carthusian monks, was founded in 1611, by Thomas Sutton, at an expense of £20,000, who also left for its endowment estates worth £4,500 per annum. The scholars are admitted on the recommendation of the governors, and receive classical and other instruction, and are supplied with all the necessaries of life. There are numerous exhibitions at the universities, belonging to this school. Those children who are found not qualified for the universities are apprenticed with a fee of £40. The governors have the advowson of nine livings. There is connected with the foundation an hospital for 80 poor men, who have been merchants or military officers, each of whom receives £14 per annum, with board and lodging. The buildings are ancient and curious, situated in Charter-house-square.

Westminster school, in Deans-yard, Westminster, was founded in 1560, by Queen Elizabeth. The foundation is for 40 scholars, who receive education and necessaries free, but many private pupils are educated here. Eight boys are admitted annually on the foundation. There are many small exhibitions in different colleges, to which the scholars of Westminster have claims.

St Paul's school, situated behind St Paul's cathedral, was founded in 1509, by Dr Colet, dean of St Paul's. The revenues exceed £6000, and 158 boys receive free education, with the prospect of valuable exhibitions in the universities. The Mercers' company are perpetual trustees, and the master of the company nominates the scholars. The building was rebuilt in 1822, after designs of Mr G. Smith; it is a handsome Grecian structure with a projecting portico of six columns, resting on a rustic basement, through which is the entrance.

Merchant-tailors' school, formed by the company in 1561, stands in Suffolk-lane, Cannon-street. In this 100 boys are educated gratis, 50 at 2s. 6d. per quarter, and 100 at 5s. This school possessed 37 fellowships in St John's college, Oxford, and many scholarships and exhibitions in other colleges.

Christ's hospital, Newgate-street, was founded in 1552, by Edward VI. on the instigation of Dr Ridley. This, which was at first only a grammar school for boys and a sewing school for girls, has gradually been extended, and at present from 1000 to 1400 boys are educated, at an annual expense of £30,000. This school has also exhibitions in the universities. The whole buildings, except a small portion of the more ancient part, have lately been rebuilt from designs by Mr Shaw. There is a preparatory school at Hertford to which the younger children are sent previously to their being admitted on the foundation.

There are 237 parish schools in London. Upwards of 20,000 children are taught in the national schools, about 12,000 in the Lancasterian, and about 66,000 in the Sunday schools.

Lectures on the various branches of Medical science are delivered at the hospitals, London university, King's college, at the schools in Windmill-street, Webb-street, and by eminent men at private establishments.

Lectures on painting, anatomy, architecture, sculpture and perspective, are delivered at the Royal academy in Somerset-house.

The Royal academy of music has been founded for the education of professed musicians.

Various Philosophical courses of lectures are delivered at the Royal Institution in Albemarle-street, and the London Institution in Moorfields. There are Mechanics' institutions in Chancery-lane, Spitalfields, Rotherhithe, &c., where lectures are delivered on various subjects, chiefly scientific.

The Gresham lectures, which had become more sinecures, are about to be resumed and delivered in the theatre of the London Institution. The endowment left by Sir T. Gresham affords a salary of £100 to each professor.

Literary Institutions.—These are so numerous that little can be done beyond enumerating them. The Royal Society, founded in 1663, by Charles II., holds its meetings in Somerset-house. It possesses a museum and library of great value. The society of Antiquaries was chartered in 1751, by George II., but was founded in 1572. They also possess a museum and library. The society for the encouragement of arts, manufactures, and commerce, was founded in 1754, and is supported by voluntary contributions. Its meetings are held in a building in John-street, Adelphi. The collection of pictures, models, &c., is of considerable value and interest. The Royal Academy, Somerset-house, was incorporated in 1765. It is instituted for the encouragement of the fine arts. An annual exhibition of works of living artists takes place in Somerset-house, at which upwards of £6,000 are drawn for entrance money, which is sufficient to defray all the expenses connected with the institution. The Royal society of Literature was established in 1823; its general object is the encouragement of learning. The Zoological society, which was instituted in 1826, possesses a museum and garden. The former, which is in Bruton-street, contains an extensive collection of animals preserved in various ways. The gardens, which are situated on the north-east side of the Regent's-park, are not extensive, but are laid out in such a manner as to appear so. A large number of living animals are kept here, in paddocks, dens, or cages, according to their peculiar habits. The number was upwards of 450 above a year ago. Other societies are: the Linnæan, the British Mineralogical, the Geological, the Royal Asiatic, the Entomological, the Mathematical, the Medico-Botanical, the Philosophical, the Horticultural, the board of Agriculture, the Phrenological society, the Architectural, &c. &c. The musical societies are the Philharmonic, the Antient concerts, the Cecilia society, the Madrigal club, and the Vocal concerts. The medical and surgical corporations are the Royal college of Physicians, the college of Surgeons and the Apothecaries company. There are likewise several medical societies, the members of which meet for mutual instruction.

Libraries.—The library of the British museum may be regarded as the grand national repository of books, as well as of other interesting objects. The foundation of this is due to Sir Hans Sloane, who by will directed that his collection of books and curiosities should be offered to parliament at a price much below the half of that which was expended in collecting them. Sir Robert Cotton presented his library, and those of the secretary Harley, of George III., of Mr Maddox, Major Edwards, Dr Birch, and of Dr Burney, were added at different periods by gift or purchase. "The building of the British museum (in Great Russell-street, Bloomsbury, formerly the residence of the duke of Montague,) forms a square, inclosed by a high brick wall, which excludes the house from view; at each corner is a turret, and over the great Ionic arch of the entrance is a large and handsome cupola. On entering the gate, a spacious quadrangle presents itself, with an Ionic colonnade on the south side and the main building on the north. The length of this is 216 feet and the height 57." The architect was Peter Paget, a native of Marseilles. Copies of all books entered in Stationers'-hall are given to the library. It is extremely rich in manuscripts, both ancient and modern, in rare books and curious editions. The library is open to the public on certain conditions. Among the curiosities possessed by the museum are numerous Egyptian, Grecian, and Roman antiquities, especially the Elgin marbles from the Parthenon, and an immense collection of coins. There are likewise large collections of objects illustrative of natural history, of the arts of foreign nations, and other articles which cannot well be reduced to any classification. A new and commodious building, from the elegant designs of Mr Smirke, is now in process of erection in the vacant space behind the present structure, and is intended as the future depository of the collection. When finished it will form a quadrangle, built of brick and faced with stone. The east wing, which is already completed, is an edifice of noble proportions, 500 feet long. In the centre is a portico of four Ionic columns, fronting the inner side of the quadrangle. Among the other important collections of books in the metropolis may be mentioned the City Library, in Guildhall, those of the London, Royal, and Russell Institutions, and of the Medical Society.

Public Charities.—The Foundling hospital, established in 1739, stands close to Brunswick and Mecklenburg squares. There are generally about 200 children here, and about 180 supported in the country. The annual expense is above £13,000.—The Deaf and Dumb asylum, founded in 1807, is capable of receiving 200 children.—The Magdalene asylum, in Blackfriars'-road, contains about 80 females.—The asylum at Lambeth, and the London Orphan asylum, are intended for the support and education of orphans. Females only are admitted into the former.—The school for the Indigent blind, founded in 1799, accommodates 60 persons, who are educated in various employments, so as to enable them to contribute to the support of the establishment while in it, and to their own in after life.—Greenwich and Chelsea hospitals are retreats for disabled seamen and soldiers, for descriptions of which see articles GREENWICH and CHELSEA, and where are also noticed the royal Naval and Military asylums.—St Thomas's hospital, High-street, Borough, was founded in 1213 by Richard, prior of Bermondsey, and enlarged in 1551 by the mayor and citizens of London. The whole was rebuilt in 1693, and a large addition was made in 1732. The number of patients which this hospital can contain is 485, and about 11,000 pass through it annually. The annual expense exceeds £10,000.—Guy's hospital, in St Thomas-street, Borough, was founded in 1721 by Thomas Guy, bookseller in London. The erection cost him £18,793, and the sum he bequeathed for its endowment was £219,419. In 1829, Thomas Hunt, Esq. left £200,000 to this charity. It contains upwards of 400 beds.—St Bartholomew's hospital, in West Smithfield, was founded in the last year of Henry VIII.'s reign. In 1729 it was rebuilt, after designs by Gibbs, and now forms a spacious quadrangle of lofty buildings, one side of which is occupied by the offices. There are 3 physicians, 3 surgeons, 3 assistant surgeons, and an apothecary. About 10,000 persons are annually treated in this hospital. Persons suffering from accidents are admitted at all times.—St George's hospital, near Hyde-park-corner, was founded in 1733, and rebuilt in an elegant style in 1828, after the designs of Mr Smirke. It can accommodate 350 patients.—Westminster hospital, in St James's-street, Westminster, was established in 1719.—Middlesex hospital, in Charles-street, Cavendish-square, was founded in 1745. Its finances are low, and though there are 300 beds, not above 200 patients can be admitted. Lying-in-women are attended at their own houses. There are 3 physicians, an accoucheur, and 3 surgeons.—The London hospital was founded in 1740, and rebuilt in 1759. It is situated in Whitechapel-road, and the persons relieved are seamen, watermen, coal-heavers, shipwrights, and the like.—The Small-pox hospital, Battle-bridge, opened in 1767, has been of late chiefly employed for the reception of fever cases.—Queen Charlotte's Lying-in-hospital was founded in 1752.—The British Lying-in-hospital, founded in 1749, is in Brownlow-street.—Other hospitals of this class are the City of London, the General, the Central, and the Knight-rider-street institutions, some of which receive patients, or supply attendance to the poor at their own houses, according to circumstances.—Bethlehem hospital, Lambeth, is a royal foundation for the reception of lunatics, to which Henry VIII. granted a charter of incorporation. The present structure was begun in 1812, after designs by Mr Lewis, and finished at an expense of £100,000. The front is a magnificent range, upwards of 580 feet in length. In the centre is an Ionic portico of six columns, and from the middle of the roof rises a dome. Upwards of 200 patients can be accommodated here, and the annual expense is about £18,000. The building and airing grounds occupy a space of 12 acres.—St Luke's hospital is an establishment of a similar nature, in Old-street-road. It was founded in 1732, and the present building was completed in 1786 at an expense of £55,000. The edifice is of brick, and about 500 feet long, affording accommodation for 300 patients. The annual expense is £9,000.—Besides these, there are the Lock hospital, near Hyde-park-corner; the Ophthalmic infirmary in Moorfields; the Samaritan society; the Grey-coat hospital, and the Green-coat hospital.

The dispensaries, which are about 20 in number, are of extensive usefulness, relieving upwards of 50,000 patients annually at the small expense of £5,000. There are also about 12 vaccine dispensaries, at which more than 8000 are annually vaccinated.

The principal miscellaneous charities are the following.—The Royal Humane society, founded in 1774, for the encouragement of efforts to save persons in danger of drowning.—The Small-debt Relief society, founded in 1772.—The Mendicity society, established in 1818.—The Philanthropic society.—The Prison Discipline and Marine societies.—The African institution.—The Westminster Benevolent society.—The British and Foreign Bible society, and many others too numerous to mention.

There are numerous almshouses, as Emmanuel hospital, Aske's hospital; Bancroft's, Trinity, Fishmongers', Whittington's, Drapers', Henry VIII's, and other almshouses; Norfolk college, &c.

On the subject of pauperism and parish relief, the latest information which we can obtain is the following. "The number of persons relieved permanently in London, on an average of three years, 1817-1819, was 36,034; occasionally, being parishioners, 81,282; so that the number of persons relieved from the poor rates appears to have been nearly 11½ per cent. of the resident population, while in 1803 it was only 7½. The total amount of money raised by the poor rates was £679,284 per annum, being at the rate of 13s. 5½d. per head on the population, or 2s. 5d. in the pound on the sum of £5,603,057 as assessed for property tax in 1815. The increase of pauperism has been accompanied by a decrease of friendly societies. Much pains were taken in 1815, by a remarkably humane gentleman, to ascertain the number of mendicants in London only, and the result was, that there were 6876 adults, and 7288 children, making the total of 14,164."

Places of Public Amusement.—The theatres are—the King's theatre, or Italian opera-house, in the Haymarket, is a handsome structure, erected in 1818, after designs by Mr Nash.—Drury-lane theatre, Brydges-street, erected in 1811.—Covent-garden theatre, a superb Grecian structure in Bow-street, erected in 1809 after designs by Mr Smirke.—Haymarket theatre, opened in 1821, is a fine building with a Corinthian portico of six pillars.—The English Opera-house, Strand, was burned to the ground in 1830, but is now rebuilding.—The Surrey theatre, in Blackfriars'-road, was lately opened for a secondary class of theatrical performances.—The Royal Coburg theatre was opened in 1818 in Waterloo-bridge road, for ballets, melodramas, and the like.—Saddler's-Wells, in St John's-street road, is appropriated to the performance of pantomimes, burlettas, spectacles, dancing, &c.; but is particularly famous for its aquatic exhibitions, which have some resemblance to the ancient sawmachie, the whole space beneath the stage being filled with water, and allowing a display very different from that of the other theatres.—Astley's, or the royal amphitheatre, is a summer theatre, where pantomimes, burlettas, and unrivalled feats of horsemanship, rope-dancing, &c., are exhibited.—The Adelphi theatre, Strand, is open during the winter for the performance of burlettas, pantomimes, and dancing, and in spring for an entertainment in which Messrs Mathews and Yates (the proprietors) are the sole performers.—The Olympic theatre, in Wych-street, was opened in 1806 for equestrian performances, and is now used in winter for melodramas, pantomimes, &c.—West London theatre, Tottenham-street, is similar to the last.

Of the public gardens, those of Vauxhall are alone worthy of notice. They are situated in the parish of Lambeth, near the Thames, about 1½ m. from Westminster-bridge. The gardens are beautiful and extensive, and contain a variety of walks: when open for public amusement they are illuminated with variegated lamps, and adorned with transparent devices. Nearly facing the west door is an orchestra, and opposite to it is a pavilion of the composite order. The musical performance takes place in a great room, or rotunda, 70 feet in diameter.—The tea-gardens in the metropolis and its vicinity are numerous, and well-frequented by the lower and middle classes of society, but do not deserve particular notice.

Among other public amusements are concerts, oratorios, &c. which take place at stated seasons.

The public exhibitions of works of art are the following:—The exhibition of the Royal Academy in Somerset-house; those of the British institution; of the society of British artists; and of the society of water-colour painters. The national gallery, in Pall-Mall, is open to all on four days of the week; it is not extensive, but contains some pictures of great value. Of private collections and galleries, to which admission may be obtained, the following are the most important: the duke of Sutherland's gallery; marquis of Westminster's; Mr Hope's; Mr Soane's museum, &c. The diorama, in Regent's-park, the panoramas, and the microcosm, and the cosmorama, are all interesting objects.

The colosseum, in the Regent's-park, is a superb polygon, surmounted with a dome 400 feet in circumference, and having a doric portico of six columns. It is only used for the exhibition of a panoramic view of London as seen from the top of St Paul's, from sketches taken by Mr Horner in 1821. It occupies 40,000 square feet of canvas, and the illusion is perfect.

The periodical press in the metropolis.—The newspapers have now risen to a high degree of importance. The number of copies of the morning journals now daily put into circulation is about 28,000, and of evening journals about 12,000. The profit which daily accrues to the government from this source is £722 16s. 8d. Of Sunday papers not less than 110,000 copies are circulated, producing an annual revenue of £92,000. There are 7 daily morning papers, 6 daily evening, 4 printed three times weekly, 2 twice, 1 on Monday, 1 on Tuesday, 1 on Wednesday, 4 on Thursday, 13 on Saturday, 9 on Sunday, and 4 on Sunday and Monday. Of periodical reviews there are 9, mostly quarterly; of magazines, monthly and weekly, 20; of periodical philosophical and scientific works upwards of 12, quarterly, monthly, and weekly; of theological magazines upwards of 6.

Representatives.—The city of London, comprehending in that term the whole space within the exterior boundaries of the liberties of the city of London, including the Inner-Temple and the Middle-Temple, returns 4 members to parliament. The number of electors is nearly 15,000. The returning officers are the two sheriffs. The 40s. freeholders in London vote for Middlesex. The Tower-Hamlets, comprising the several divisions of the liberties of the Tower, and the Tower division of Ossulston hundred, return 2 members. The number of electors in this district is about 23,000. The borough of Southwark also returns 2; as likewise the old city and liberties of Westminster. Two members are also returned by the Finsbury division of the city, comprising about 23,000 electors.

Antiquities.—The remains of ancient religious buildings about the metropolis are pretty numerous, but in many cases so trifling as to be scarcely worthy of notice. The most important are to be found at Westminster abbey, Bermondsey abbey, the Charter-house, the Temple, the Roll's-chapel, &c. There were upwards of 50 monastic establishments; monasteries, convents, colleges, priories, &c. Fragments of the ancient walls may be seen in various places, but the works of the Romans have been entirely obliterated.

Among the many celebrated men to whom London has given birth may be named, Thomas à Becket, Geoffrey Chaucer, Sir Thomas More, Edmund Spenser, Lord Bacon, Ben Jonson, John Milton, Alexander Pope, Sir William Blackstone, Dr S. Horsley, the Right Hon. Geo. Canning, and Lord Byron.

LONTON, a hamlet in the parish of Middleton-in-Teesdale, co.-palatine of Durham.

LONSDALE, a ward in the south-eastern part of the co. of Westmoreland. It is bounded by the counties of York and Lancaster, and takes its name from the river Lune, which passes through it. It contains three parishes, with the town of Kirkby-Lonsdale, and the pop., in 1831, was 5440.

LONSDALE (NORTH OF THE SANDS), a hun dred in the northern extremity of the co.-palatine of Lancaster. It is bounded by Westmoreland, Cumberland, the Irish sea, and the co. of York. The river Ken and bay of Morecambe divide it from the rest of the county. It contains nine parishes, with the boroughs of Hawkshead and Ulverston. Pop., in 1831, 24,311.

LONSDALE (SOUTH OF THE SANDS), a hundred in the co.-palatine of Lancaster, lying to the S. of the river Ken. It takes its name from the Lune, which passes through it. It contains 12 parishes, with the borough of Lancaster. Pop., in 1831, 19,802.

LOOE (EAST), a market-town, borough, chapelry, and sea-port, in the parish of St Martin, hundred of West, co. of Cornwall, but having separate jurisdiction. It is situated on the English channel, at the mouth of the river Looe, which is here crossed by an ancient bridge of 13 stone arches. The name is probably taken from that of the river, though, perhaps, it is derived from the Cornish Lo, a port. The importance of Looe was formerly much greater than at present. It was erected into a market-town by Henry II., at the instance of Henry de Bodrygan, lord of the manor. In the reign of Edward III., it was able to equip 30 ships and man them with 315 sailors, for the siege of Calais. The inhabitants are much employed in the pilchard fishery, and had formerly considerable trade with France, Spain, and the Mediterranean. This has considerably declined. and in 1826 the whole number of vessels employed in foreign trade was four which cleared inwards, and three outwards. In 1828, two vessels of upwards of 100 tons, and 24 of smaller burden, belonged to the port. These are chiefly employed in coasting trade. Tin, copper, and lead, timber, salt, bark, and fish, are exported; the chief imports are coal, culm, and limestone. The Looe and Liskeard canal facilitates internal conveyance; much tin is brought from Liskeard for sea carriage. The port is defended by a battery of ten guns erected on the shore. The scenery in the vicinity is remarkably fine. Saturday is market day. Fairs for cattle, &c., are held on February 13th, July 10th, September 4th, and October 10th. The town received its first charter of incorporation from Queen Elizabeth in 1587, which was confirmed in 1623 by James I. These charters were surrendered to James II., on the granting of a new one in 1685. The corporation consists of a mayor, recorder, 8 aldermen, 12 capital burgesses, and 36 free burgesses. Of these, the mayor and recorder are in the commission of the peace; also the late mayor, and the deputies whom the mayor and recorder may appoint. The mayor and recorder are elected by the aldermen, who are in turn chosen by the mayor and aldermen. Petty offences are tried at the borough sessions once or twice a year. The charter authorises the holding of a court of record, but it has been disused. Here is a gaol for felons and debtors. The town is a borough by prescription, and sent a delegate, in conjunction with West Poywy, to a national council held at Westminster by Edward I. Two members were returned in the 13th Elizabeth, and ever since, till the passing of the reform act, when this place was included in the fatal schedule A. The influence of the Buller family was wont to predominate. Living, a perpetual curacy in the archd. of Cornwall and dio. of Exeter, rated at £27. Patrons, J. Buller, Esq., and the Rev. Sir H. Trelawney, Bart. Here is a free chapel, endowed in 1716 by the bishop of Exeter. It was rebuilt in 1806. The Wesleyan Methodists and Society of Friends have places of worship here. Here is a well-endowed free school for all children of the county, founded in 1716, by John Speecot, Esq. Looe is 234 m. W.S.W. from London. Pop., in 1801, 467; in 1831, 865. A. P., £920.

LOOE (WEST), a chapelry and borough in the parish of Talland, hundred of West, co. of Cornwall, but having separate jurisdiction. It was formerly a market-town, but the market, which was held on Saturday, has been discontinued. A fair for cattle, &c., is held on the 6th of May. The town lies opposite East Looe, on the west side of the river Looe, and has a small harbour defended by a battery. It was also called Port Pigham, after the name of a manor now annexed to the duchy of Cornwall, and held on lease from the crown by the corporation. The town was incorporated by charter of Elizabeth, dated 1573. The corporation consists of a mayor, 11 burgesses, steward, town-clerk, and other officers. The mayor and steward are justices of the peace within the borough, and are entitled to hold a weekly court for the recovery of debts under £5, but this has been disused. An annual court leet is held. The chapel was dedicated to St Nicholas, and had fallen into ruins, but was repaired for a guildhall. The Independents have a place of worship here. The borough returned two members to parliament from the 6th of Edward VI. till the passing of the reform act, when it was disfranchised. West Looe is 16 m. W. from Plymouth, and 234 W.S.W. from London. Pop., in 1801, 376; in 1831, 593. A. P., £565.

LOOSE, a parish in the hundred of Maidstone, lathe of Aylesford, co. of Kent. Living, a perpetual curacy, not in charge, a peculiar of the archbishop of Canterbury. Church ded. to All Saints. LOSTWITHIEL, a borough, market, and county town, and parish, locally in the eastern division of the hundred of Powder, co. of Cornwall, but having separate jurisdiction. It lies on the banks of the river Fawy, in a beautiful valley. The high road from Plymouth to Balmouth passes through it, and the river, over which there is a bridge, is navigable for very small barges. The houses are chiefly of stone, and form two parallel streets, which are paved and lighted. This town was anciently possessed of numerous and valuable privileges, such as being the sole stannary town in Cornwall, and the county-town. Its exclusive privileges have been gradually taken away, though it remains the county-town so far that the elections of the knights of the shire take place here. Here is a neat town-hall, with a prison, erected in 1740. The shire-hall was erected by Edmund, earl of Cornwall, nephew of Henry III. The trade of the town consists chiefly in the importation of coal and timber, and in the exportation of the produce of the tin and copper mines. Slate is found in abundance in the neighbourhood. Friday is market-day, and fairs for horses, cattle, and sheep are held March 31st, July 10th, September 4th, and November 13th. The market-house was erected in 1781, at the expense of Lord Mount-Edgcumbe. Pop., in 1801, 743; in 1831, 1548. A. P., £1,498.

This town was made a free borough by Richard, earl of Cornwall, brother of Henry III. It returned two members to parliament from the reign of Edward I. downwards, to the passing of the reform act by which it was disfranchised. The influence of the earl of Mount-Edgcumbe was predominate here under the old system. The first charter of incorporation was granted to the town in 1623 by James I. It was renewed in 1738 by George II. and the corporate body consists of a mayor, six aldermen, 17 assistants, a recorder and other officers. These supply vacancies occurring in their own body. The mayor—who is coroner—the late mayor, and the recorder, are justices of the peace. Petty sessions are held on Friday. The mayor holds an annual court-leet. Lostwithiel being a manor of the duchy of Cornwall, pays a quit-rent of £11 19s. 10d., in return for which they not only enjoy the profits of all their own tolls, but also the bushelage of coals, salt, malt, and corn, sold in the town of Fowey.

Living, a discharged vicarage in the archd. of Cornwall and dio. of Exeter, rated at £2 13s. 4d., returned at £92 10s., and in patronage of the earl of Mount-Edgcumbe. The church, ded. to St Bartholomew, is an interesting structure of considerable antiquity, in the early style of English architecture. The Independents, Wesleyan and Primitive Methodists, and Bryanites, have places of worship here. Here is a free grammar school, endowed with £50 per annum. There are also several other schools with small endowments. In the vicinity are the ruins of Restormel-castle, the ancient seat of the Cardinan family. It was fortified by the parliamentary party in the reign of Charles I. Distance from London, 234 m. W.S.W.

LOTHERS and BOTHERNHAMPTON, a hundred in the Bridport division of the co. of Dorset. It contains three parishes, and the borough of Lyme-Regis.

LOUGHBOROUGH, a market-town and parish in the western division of the hundred of Goscote, co. of Leicester. It contains the townships of Knight-thorpe, Loughborough, and Wood-thorpe. The town is situated in the midst of a beautiful country, on the high road from London to Manchester, and consists of a number of streets, paved and lighted. The houses are chiefly of brick and the general aspect of the town is respectable. It has been much improved by new buildings since some destructive fires which took place at different times. Here are a subscription library and a theatre. The chief manufactures are those of hosiery, cotton goods, and bobbinet. There is considerable trade carried on through the Loughborough canal, which communicates with the river Soar, the Union canal and the Leicester navigation. Slate is found in the vicinity. Thursday is market-day, and fairs for horses, cows, sheep, cheese, &c., are held February 14th, March 24th and 28th, April 25th, Holy Thursday, August 12th, September 25th, and November 18th and 14th. A new market-house was recently erected.

The lord of the manor holds an annual court, at which are chosen a jury of twelve men, two constables, two third-boroughs, the street masters, field-men, pinders, parish-beadle, common crier, and watchmen, for the regulation of the affairs of the town. The petty-sessions for the hundred are held here weekly, and an annual court-baron is held. Loughborough is the principal place of election of the members for the northern division of the county.

LOUND, a parish in the hundred of Mutford and Lotheringland, co. of Suffolk. Living, a discharged rectory in the archd. of Suffolk and dio. of Norwich, rated at £8. Patron, in 1829, the Rev. J. Blanchard. Church ded. to St John the Baptist. It is 5 m. N.W. by N. from Lowestoft. Pop., in 1801, 332; in 1831, 425. A. P., £2,263.

LOUTH, a market-town and parish, locally in the Wold division of the hundred of Louth-Eske, parts of Lindsey, co. of Lincoln, but having separate jurisdiction. The name is derived from Luda, the ancient appellation founded on its situation near the river Ludd. It stands in an agreeable valley on the south side of the Ludd, and to the eastward of the Wolds. The streets are neat and the houses well-constructed of brick and roofed with tiles. Water is obtained in abundance from springs. Here are a small theatre, assembly-room, billiard and news rooms, a handsome town-hall or session-house and prison. The inhabitants have considerable employment in some carpet, blanket, paper, and soap manufactories. There is also considerable trade in wool and woollen articles. A market-house for this branch of commerce was erected in 1825. Here are also ship-builders, and other artisans more or less directly connected with ship-building. A canal was formed in 1761 and subsequent years, between this place and the Humber, at an expense of £12,000. Through this, the town has considerable trade with Yorkshire and London. The exports are corn and wool; the imports coal, timber, iron, groceries, &c. Wednesday and Saturday are market days. Cattle-markets are held every Friday in spring. Fairs for horses and cattle are held April 30th, 3d Monday after Easter, August 5th, and November 23d.

The town was incorporated by a charter of 5th Edward VI., and is governed by a warden and six assistants, with a high-steward, bailiff, and town-clerk. The warden and one assistant are justices of the peace for the parish, and hold petty-sessions every Wednesday, and quarter-sessions in January, April, July, and October. A court of requests for debts under £5, is also held here. In the prison is a treadmill. The manor of Louth and various other lands, valued at £78 14s. 4d. yearly, were granted to the corporation by Queen Elizabeth. The quarter-sessions for the southern division of the parts of Lindsey are held alternately here and at Spilsby. Before the Reformation there were here three fraternities or guilds of traders, under the patronage of the church. Their property was applied by Edward VI. to the endowment of a free school and almshouses.

There were formerly two parish churches in Louth, but that of St Mary is in ruins. Living, a discharged vicarage, a peculiar of the prebendary of Louth in the cathedral of Lincoln, rated at £12. The church, ded. to St James, is a beautiful structure in the later style of English architecture, with a rich tower and spire, 288 feet in height. Annexed to the living is the perpetual curacy of St Mary, Louth. The prebend of Louth is rated at £36 3s. 4d., and in patronage of the bishop. The Baptists, Independents, Methodists, and Roman Catholics have places of worship here. Here is a free school, under the direction of the corporation. The revenues of the dissolved guilds, now amounting to £600 per annum, were bestowed on it by Edward VI. Of this sum £300 are given to the master, £150 to the usher, and £150 are bestowed on twelve almswomen. Here is a school founded by Dr Mapletost, endowed with £5 per annum. Here is also a national school for 300 children. Alexander, bishop of Lincoln, A.D. 1139, built an abbey in the park near Louth for the Cistercian monks, whom he brought from Fountains to Haverholm. The revenues were about £169. Of the buildings very slight traces remain. Distance from London, 149 m. N. by E. Pop., in 1801, 4236; in 1831, 6927. A. P., £16,497.

LOWESBY, or LOSEBY, a parish in the eastern division of the hundred of Goscoat, co. of Leicester. Living, a discharged vicarage, rated at £7 1s. 5½d., returned at £57, in the archd. of Leicester and dio. of Lincoln, and in patronage of Sir J. G. Fowke, Bart. Church ded. to All Saints. The parish contains the chapelry of Cold-Newton. It is 10 m. E. by N. from Leicester. Pop., in 1801, 46; in 1831, with Cold-Newton, 231. A. P., £2,437.

LOWESTOFT, a sea-port, parish, and market-town, in the hundred of Mutford and Lothlingland, co. of Suffolk. The origin of the name—which has been variously spelt Lotherwistoff, Laystoft, Lestoff, Leostoff, and Lowestoff—is involved in doubt. Tradition refers it to Lothbrock, a Danish noble, who held an estate and resided here, in the kingdom of the East Angles. The history of this town presents nothing remarkable except the ravages which were committed by the plague, the number of shipwrecks which have occurred on the coast, and an engagement between the Dutch and English fleets which took place within sight of the town. The town is situated on a lofty headland on the shore of the German ocean. This is considered the extreme eastern point of England, and between it and Greenwich the difference of time is seven minutes. The principal street is of considerable length, and from it many smaller streets diverge on both sides. The houses are built of brick, and have in general a neat appearance, especially those which are constructed on the face of the declivity leading to the beach. The streets are paved, and the situation is dry and healthy. It is pretty much frequented by invalids and young families during summer, as the shore is well adapted for bathers, for whose accommodation bathing machines are kept. In the town are a theatre, assembly-room, subscription reading-room and library, and a bathing-house. Races are held annually on the downs to the north of the town. The houses, which stand on the face of the cliff, have gardens and terraces, and present a very agreeable aspect from the sea. On the shore are two light-houses; the upper is of stone, and has a revolving lantern, the lower is constructed of timber, and can be removed at pleasure. This is necessary, for as the mariners are guided to a proper channel by bringing the lights to coincide, and as the shifting nature of the sands alter the direction of the channel very often, it is obvious that if the lights were fixed, they would occasionally indicate a wrong course. The parish was anciently a demesne of the crown, and by a charter granted by George II., are exempted from serving on juries, either at the assizes or quarter-sessions, but not from those empannelled by the lord of the manor or coroner. Wednesday is market-day; and fairs are held on May 12th, St Michael's day, and October 10th. Here are manufactures of china-ware, soap, twine, and sail-cloth. Here are also boat-building and sail-making establishments. The chief support of the inhabitants is the herring fishery, in which about 40 boats, from 20 to 45 tons burden, are employed. The herrings are in great request in the London market, on account of their superior quality. Mackerel and soles are caught in abundance at certain seasons and sent to Norwich and London. The coast is protected by two forts and a small battery. A harbour, intended as a refuge for vessels in bad weather, has been constructed here. It has been made to communicate with Lake Lothing, into which the river Waveney runs. This communicates with the Yare, and opens a communication between Lowestoft, Beccles, and Bungay. The county magistrates hold petty sessions here every week, and the steward occasional manorial courts.

The living is a vicarage in the archd. of Suffolk and dio. of Norwich, rated at £10 1s. 0½d. Patron, the crown or the bishop. The church—which is ded. to St Margaret—is a handsome structure, in the later style of English architecture, having a tower 182 feet in height, a curiously ornamented roof, an antique font, and a fine eastern window of stained glass. It contains the tombs of Lord-chief-justice Holt, and of the learned and Rev. Robert Potter, the translator of the Greek tragedies, who was vicar of this parish, and died in 1804, at the age of 84 years. Here are a chapel-of-ease, and places of worship belonging to the Independents, Baptists, and Wesleyan Methodists. Here are a free grammar school for 23 boys, and another free school of later foundation, also a national school for boys. Some curious organic remains are found in the cliffs in the vicinity. Distance from London, 114 m. N.E. by N. Pop., in 1801, 2332; in 1831, 4238. A. P., £7,451.

Patrons, Sir James Sandford Graham, and Mr Everett. The church, ded. to St James, is an ancient building in the early English style, there is also a meeting house for Baptists here. There are several charitable institutions in this parish, one in particular yielding about £20 per annum, bequeathed by a person called 'Beggan Smith,' for the relief of the poor in winter. It was a borough by prescription, governed by a bailiff, and began to send members regularly to parliament in the reign of Henry V., but was disfranchised on the passing of the reform act. This place is supposed to have been founded by the Saxons, and under them to have been a place of such importance as to be made the residence of some of the Anglo-Saxon kings. Soon after the conquest a castle was built here, which is supposed to have been taken down about the time of Henry III. Slight traces of the ruins are still visible in the vicinity. This castle is said by Stow to have been given by Richard I. to his brother, prince John, and to have belonged in the reign of the latter to the earl of Essex. The great seal of England used in the reign of Stephen, was found some years ago in this parish. Distance from London, 71 m. W.S.W.; from Salisbury, 16½ m. P., £5,755.

LUDHAM, a parish in the hundred of Happing, co. of Norfolk. Living, rated at £5 6s. 8d., a discharged vicarage in the archd. of Norfolk, within the dio. and under the patronage of the bishop of Norwich. Church ded. to St Catherine. The Baptists and Wesleyan Methodists have each places of worship here. After the reign of Queen Mary the diocesans resided here. In 1611 an accidental fire destroyed the house belonging to them, along with a number of valuable books. In the reign of Elizabeth grants were obtained for a market and fair, which are now discontinued. Distance from Acle, 5 m. N. Pop., in 1801, 724; in 1831, 909. A. P., £4,199.

LUDLOW, a parish, borough, and market-town, situated within the limits but beyond the jurisdiction of the hundred of Munslow, co. of Salop. Living, a rectory in the archd. of Salop and dio. of Hereford, rated at £19 12s. 6d., and in the patronage of the crown. The church, ded. to St Lawrence, is a very beautiful specimen of Gothic architecture of the early English and decorated styles; it is built in the form of a cross, surmounted with a square tower 130 feet in height, crowned with pinnacles; the principal entrance is by a hexagonal porch into the nave, which is separated from the aisles by six arches on each side, and is lighted by a range of small and one large west window; the choir is lighted by five windows on each side, and one splendid east window which occupies almost the whole end, and is filled with stained glass, the compartments of which represent the history of the tutelary saint. On the north side of the choir is a chapel ded. to St John, which is remarkable for some precious relics of stained glass recording the presentation of a ring to Edward the Confessor, by some pilgrims from Palestine. The parliamentary commissioners under Cromwell destroyed many of the ornaments of this church, but left untouched the richly wrought oaken roof which still adorns several parts of the building. The ecclesiastical courts are held here in May and October, for granting probates of wills and letters of administration. In the chancel are several interesting monuments, especially one erected to the memory of Judge Bridgeman and his lady. The Independents and Methodists have places of worship in the town. The free grammar school which exists in this town was founded in the reign of Edward IV. There is also a national school attended by about 200 scholars. A public dispensary and lying-in institution are supported by public contribution. A work-house, was endowed in 1674.

History, Castle, &c.—Ludlow appears formerly to have been included within the borders of Wales, as from its name in the British language it seems to have been the site of a castle belonging to the Welsh princes. After the conquest Robert de Montgomery, to whom it was then presented, built a castle here and fortified the town strongly with walls. This castle, having fallen to the crown on the attainder of the Montgomery family, was put under the charge of Gervase Paganell, who, being in the interest of the Empress Maude, held it out for some time against the forces of King Stephen. In the reign of Henry III. we find it made by proclamation the place of rendezvous for the lords marchers, for the purpose of assisting Roger Mortimer, at that time governor, in restraining the Welsh marauders, and shortly after it was nearly demolished by the earl of Leicester, who had joined the confederated barons in rebellion. Roger Mortimer, a descendant of the above mentioned governor, having escaped from the Tower of London, built a chapel within the castle in commemoration of his success, but being re-taken in the reign of Edward III. he was executed for high-treason. Having come into the possession of Richard, duke of York, the castle, on his insurrection, was subjected to a siege by the forces of Henry VI., and on its capture the town was plundered by the soldiery, and the duchess of York with her two sons fell into the hands of the conqueror. In the subsequent wars of the Roses it was chiefly in the possession of the house of York, and was afterwards made the residence of Edward V. and his brother the duke of York, previous to their fatal removal to the Tower of London. Prince Arthur, the son of Henry VII. died here and was buried in the church of St Laurence. Being now a place of considerable extent it was, by Henry VIII., made the seat of a 'Council in the marches of Wales,' which consisting of a lord-president, counsellors, and 4 justices of the peace, constituted a local government which continued in operation till the time of William III., who abolished the court and appointed in its place lords-lieutenants of North and South Wales. During the civil war the castle held out under the earl of Bridgewater, for the interest of the king, but was ultimately surrendered to the parliament. Ludlow-castle is famous for having been the place where Milton's 'Comus' was first performed, in 1631. The remains of the castle are still to be seen, situated on an eminence overhanging the river Corve, and forming an important feature in a country rich in picturesque scenery. Part of the site of the castle is occupied with a delightful promenade planted with trees. In the interior, on the right hand are the barracks, erected by the lords-presidents, and on the left is the beautiful and massive keep, of Norman architecture, 110 feet in height, the walls being from 9 to 12 feet in thickness, opposite to the portal—which is a paltry specimen of modern taste—are the state apartments and principal hall, in the early and decorated English styles of Gothic architecture, but which are now in a great measure in ruins. Of the chapel is now standing little more than a Norman arch leading to the choir and the nave. The solemn and picturesque nature of these ruins added to the historical interest which they possess, makes them a favourite resort for travellers and artists. In this neighbourhood, Lucien, the brother of Napoleon Buonaparte, resided for some years.

General Description.—The town is situated at the confluence of the Teme and Corve, the former bounds it on the west and south, and is crossed by an old bridge, at one end of which is the Broadgate, now the only remaining town-gate. Over the Corve, which is on the north-west of the town, is a bridge of three arches erected in 1738. Part of the wall, built in the reign of Edward I., can still be traced. The town is well-sited and the houses in general well-built; it is paved and arrangements for lighting it with gas have been made. There are a public subscription and two circulating libraries here, and assemblies are held in a suit of rooms in the market-house, which is a large brick building containing rooms for the corporation and other public offices, with the corn-market below, and a reservoir for water attached, from which the town is supplied. There is also a guild-hall in which the borough-courts are held. The prison, built in 1764, contains 4 wards for the different descriptions of prisoners, and one yard for the common use. There is a market on Monday for grain, and on Wednesday, Friday, and Saturday, for provisions. The fairs held in this town are, two on the Monday before February 13th, and on the 6th December for dairy produce; and five for horses, cattle, sheep, hops, &c., on the Tuesday before Easter, May 1st, Wednesday in Whitsun-week, August 21st, and September 28th. The manufactures of gloves and malt are rather extensively carried on in Ludlow, and there are woollen, corn, and paper-mills on the Teme.

Municipal Government, &c.—The charter of the corporation appears to have been ancient, it was however renewed by Edward IV. and Charles I., annulled on a writ of quo warranto by Charles II., again renewed by James II., and finally had its ancient constitution restored by William III. As it now stands, the municipality consists of a recorder, two bailiffs, two justices, 12 aldermen, and 25 common-councilmen; there is also a town-clerk, coroner, and subordinate officers; the five first named office-bearers are justices of the peace ex officio within the liberties; the election of the high bailiff from among the aldermen, and the low bailiff from the common-councilmen takes place on the 13th October, annually, with no small display of civic pomp and splendour; the corporation appoint the recorder for life, subject, however, to the approbation of the king; the freedom of the borough is attainable either by being the son or by marrying the daughter of a freeman. A court of session is held quarterly by the corporation, but on account of the recorders of late not being barristers, all capital offences are tried at the county-assizes. A court is held here every Tuesday for the recovery of all debts, as also a petty-court of requests for debts under 40s. The borough first returned members to parliament in the 12th year of Edward IV., the right of election is now possessed by about 550 voters. This town is one of the polling places for the members for the southern division of the county. Among the natives of this place who have distinguished themselves, may be mentioned Thomas Johnes, Esq., the author of the quaint translations of Froissart's chronicles, Monstrelet, and other works; R. P. Knight, author of an essay on taste; T. A. Knight, author of various Horticultural works; and Dr Badham, an excellent classical scholar and the translator of Juvenal. Distance from London, 142 m. N.W. by W.; from Shrewsbury, 29 m. S. by E. Pop., in 1801, 8897; in 1831, 5253. A. P., £9,407.

LUDNEY, a hamlet in the parish of Grainthorpe, co. of Lincoln. Distance from Louth, 8 m. N.E.

LUDNEY, a hamlet in the parish of Kingstons, Somersetshire.

LUDSHOT, in the parish of Bramshot, co. of Southampton, 7½ m. S.E. from Alton.

LUDWELL, in the parish of Charleton, Wiltshire, 17½ m. W.S.W. from Salisbury.

LUDWELL-BRIDGE, in the parish of Cutcombe, co. of Somerset, 7½ m. S.W. from Dunster.

LUDWORTH, a township in conjunction with Chisworth, in the parish of Glossop, hundred of High-Peak, co. of Derby. Living, a curacy in the archd. of Derby and dio. of Lichfield and Coventry, rated at £4 4s. 4d.; patronage with Glossop rectory. Distance from Chapel-en-le-Frith, 9½ m. N.W. by N. Pop., in 1801, 866; in 1831, 1794. A. P., £3,140.

LUFENHALE, a hamlet in the parish of Yardley, co. of Hertford. Distance from Stevenage, 5 m. N.E.

LUFFENHAM (NORTH), a parish in the hundred of Wrangdike, co. of Rutland. Living, a rectory in the archd. of Northampton and dio. of Peterborough, rated at £17 0s. 6d. Church ded. to St John the Baptist, in the patronage of Emanuel college, Cambridge. In this parish are schools, endowed by a former rector Archdeacon Johnson. Distance from Uppingham, 5½ m. N.E. by E. Pop., in 1801, 357; in 1831, 447. A. P., £2,328.

LUFFENHAM (SOUTH), a parish in the hundred of Wrangdike, and co. of Rutland. Living, a rectory in the archd. of Northampton and dio. of Peterborough, rated at £12 12s. 6d. Patron, in 1829, John Bush, Esq. Church ded. to St Mary. There is a subscription school here. Distance from Uppingham, 5½ m. N.E. by E. Pop., in 1801, 227; in 1831, 273. A. P., £1,719.

LUFFIELD, an extra-parochial liberty, partly in the hundred of Green's-Norton, co. of Northampton, and partly in the hundred and co. of Buckingham. In 1124, Robert Bossu, earl of Leicester, founded a priory here, which was suppressed in 1494, on account of its funds not being sufficient for its support; it was presented by Henry VII. to the abbot of Westminster, and its site is now occupied by a farm-house. Distance from Buckingham, 5½ m. N.N.W. Pop., in 1801, 16; in 1831, 10.

LUFFINCOTT, a parish in the hundred of Black Torrington, co. of Devon. Living, a discharged rectory in the archd. of Totness and dio. of Exeter, rated at £5 6s. 8d., returned at £60. Patrons, in 1829, J. Venner, and J. Spettigue, Esqrs. Church ded. to St James. Distance from Holworthy, 6 m. S. by W. Pop., in 1801, 76; in 1831, 92. A. P., £203.

LUFTON, a parish in the hundred of Stone, co. of Somerset. Living, a rectory in the archd. of Wells and dio. of Bath and Wells, rated at £5 7s. 8½d. Patron, John Phelps, Esq. Church ded. to St Peter and St Paul. Distance from Yeovil, 3 m. W. Pop., in 1831, 20.

LUGWARDINE, a parish in the hundred of Radlow, co. of Hereford. Living, a vicarage with the curacies of Ballingham, Little Dewchurch, Hentland, Langarrin, and St Weonard; it is exempt from visitation, being under the peculiar jurisdiction and patronage of the dean and chapter of Hereford; it is rated at £22 7s. 1d. Church ded. to St Peter. Distance from Hereford, 3 m. E. by N. Pop., in 1801, 585; in 1831, 662. A. P., £3,815.

LUKE (Sr), a chapelry in the hundred of Easebourne, rape of Chichester, co. of Sussex. Distance from Midhurst, 3 m. N.N.W.

LUKE'S (Sr), a parish in the hundred of Ossulstone, Finsbury division, co. of Middlesex. It includes the liberties of the City Road, East and West Finsbury, Whitecross-street, Golden-lane, and Old-street. Part of this district was formerly occupied by a fen, which is said to have given name to Finsbury. In the protectorship of the duke of Somerset, a great part of this fen was raised by means of a large quantity of bones from the charnel-house of St Paul's, from whence the name of Bonehill (now Bunhill) Fields. Part of it was used as a cemetery during the plague of 1665; another part was appropriated by the corporation of London, in 1498, as a place of exercise for archery, which last is now in the possession of the artillery company, who equipped a regiment at their own expense during the late war, and possess—in the grounds called from them the Artillery ground—buildings for regimental purposes. Along this fen ran the Roman road, called by the Saxons Eald, or Old-street, which beginning at London-wall, was continued through St Leonard's church-yard, Shoreditch, parish of Bethnal-Green, and terminated at the Old Ford, near Blackney. St Luke's was formerly part of the parish of Cripple-gate, but in the reign of Queen Anne it was erected into a parish, and since then it has increased very much both in size and population. Bath-street is built on the site of one of the lazarettoes used during the plague. The pond, called by Stowe Perilous pool, has been converted into a capacious swimming-bath, and the Kennel occupied by the city bounds stood where Featherstone-street is now built. In this parish are several extensive manufactories, in particular an indigo-work, a brewery, a rope-work, and some cooperages; the London gas company has also an establishment here. The City basin and Regent's canal afford the means of communication with all parts of the country. Along the latter have been erected many wharfs for the reception of lime, coal, timber, and other kinds of produce. Like the other metropolitan parishes, St Luke's is well lighted with gas, and possesses a copious supply of water.

Living, &c.—Living, a rectory, not in charge, in the archd. of Middlesex and dio. of London. Patrons, the dean and chapter of St Paul's. St Luke's church is in the Grecian style, remarkable for its steeple, which is in the form of a fluted obelisk; it is a plain, substantial building, with a very neat interior, built in 1732. In the church-yard are the tombs of the Caslons, formerly type-founders in the parish. In King's square stands St John's church, which was built in 1823, at an expense to parliament of £12,853 3s. 3d., and contains accommodation for about 1600 people. It is built of brick, with an Ionic porch in front, and surmounted with a slender spire. Living, a perpetual curacy. Patron, the rector. The place of worship belonging to the Calvinistic Methodists was built by the Rev. J. Whitefield, the founder of the sect. John Wesley's chapel here is also in the possession of the Wesleyan Methodists. Besides these, the Baptists and Independents possess places of worship here. That place already mentioned as having been a cemetery during the plague, is now known by the name of Tindal's, or Bunhill-Fields burying-ground. It is under the management of the London corporation; and there are annually buried here from 1200 to 1500 persons, the greater proportion of whom consist of dissenters. The well-known Bunyan, Dr Isaac Watts, Dr A. Reese, editor of the Cyclopædia which bears his name, and many other eminent dissenters are buried here.

Schools, Hospitals, &c.—Here are a parish school for boys, founded in 1698, and one for girls in 1761; they are each attended by about 100 pupils, who are clothed by the institution. The free school, founded by William Warral in 1689, was formerly in Goat-alley, but was removed some years ago to Baltic-street, Golden-lane, where it now is; its endowment amounts to about £300 per annum. In this parish there are three schools on the Lancastrian system, namely, one belonging to the haberdashers' company in Bunhill-row, one for boys in North-street, City-road, established in 1813, and another for girls in 1820. The orphan working-school was instituted, chiefly by the exertions of dissenters, in 1760, and is now possessed of an annual income of about £718, which sum, together with the annual subscriptions, is expended on the education of poor orphan children, who are not only taught reading, writing, arithmetic, &c., but are instructed in the elements of some trade, and on leaving school, are apprenticed at the expense of the institution. The school contains accommodation for about 50 boys and the same number of girls. St Luke's hospital for lunatics was originally established as a branch of Bethlehem-hospital, and at the time of its foundation was considered superior to the parent institution. The present structure is of brick. It consists of a centre and two wings, and is throughout three stories in height, its length being 493 feet. Besides containing apartments for the office-bearers of the hospital, there is accommodation for 300 patients, arranged in classes. There is a French hospital in Bath-street, incorporated in the reign of George I., which is an excellent substantial building, forming three sides of a square. This institution is intended for the support and relief of French Protestants, and is chiefly conducted by the descendants of old French families. The City of London lying-in hospital is a handsome building of brick, laid out with every accommodation for patients, and useful as a school of midwifery exclusively open to females. Besides the numerous charities mentioned above, there are other bequests for the purpose of distribution among the poor. Pop., in 1801, 26,891; in 1831, 46,642. A. P., £138,356.

LULLINGSTANE, in the lower half-hundred of Axton, lathe of Sutton-at-Hone, co. of Kent, was formerly a separate parish, but is now united to Lullingstone, the church having been demolished. The living was then a discharged vicarage.

LULLINGSTONE, a parish in the hundreds of Axton, Dartford, and Wilmington, lathe of Sutton-at-Hone, co. of Kent. Living, a discharged rectory along with the vicarage of Lullingstane, in the archd. and dio. of Rochester, rated at £7 16s. 8d., in the patronage of Sir Thomas Dyke, in 1829. Church—ded. to St Botolph—is of small dimensions, but is remarkable for the beauty of its interior. The pavement is tessellated, and a richly carved screen supports the rood loft; the painted glass represents some scenes from holy writ, and the church contains some splendid monuments erected to the memory of different members of Bokesle, Peche, Hart, and Dyke families. "Sir John Peche, knight-banneret, lord-deputy of Calais, a man very eminent for charity and bounty to the poor, founded the alms-houses here."—Tanner's Not. Mon. Roman antiquities have been found here. Distance from Foot's-Cray, 5½ m. S.E. by E. Pop., in 1801, 33; in 1831, 40. A. P., £1,519.

LULLINGTON, a parish in the hundred of Repton and Gresley, co. of Derby. Living, a discharged vicarage in the archd. of Derby and dio. of Lichfield and Coventry, rated at £4 11s. 10d., and in the patronage of the crown. Church ded. to All Saints. In Domesday book we find it mentioned, that 'Lullitune' had at that time a priest, a church, and a mill. Being within the honour of Tutbury, duchy of Lancaster, it is within the jurisdiction of a court of pleas, held there every third Tuesday for the recovery of debts under 40s. Distance from Burton-upon-Trent, 7 m. S. Pop., in 1801, 245; in 1831, 548. A. P., £2,502.

LULLINGTON, a parish in the hundred of Frome, and co. of Somerset. Living, a rectory, not in charge, in the archd. of Wells and dio. of Bath and Wells, returned at £24. Church—ded. to All Saints—is partly Norman and partly of a later Gothic. Patron, in 1829, Rich. H. Cox, Esq. Distance from Frome, 3 m. N. by E. Pop., in 1801, 157; in 1831, 145. A. P., £1,163.

LULLINGTON, a parish in the hundred of Alceston, rape of Pevensey, and co. of Sussex. Living, a discharged vicarage in the archd. of Lewes and dio. of Chichester, rated at £6 12s. 11d., returned at £29. Patron, the bishop of Chichester. Distance from Seaford, 4 m. N.E. by E. Pop., in 1801, 32; in 1831, 49. A. P., £762.

LULLWORTH (EAST), a parish in the hundred of Winfrith, Blandford division of the co. of Dorset. Living, a discharged vicarage in the archd. of Dorset and dio. of Bristol, rated at £11 14s. 7d., returned at £92 16s. The church—ded. to St Andrew—contains many ancient monuments of the family of Newburgh, and has a remarkable tower of a conical shape. This place was first in the possession of the De Lollsworths; it afterwards became successively the property of the Newburgh family, and the earls of Suffolk. In 1588, one of the latter commenced the present castle, which being finished in 1641, became, by purchase, the property of the Welds, who still possess it. It is a massive structure, forming an exact cube of 80 feet, with a round tower at each corner; the interior is in a corresponding degree of magnificence, and the castle is surrounded with an extensive park. Charles X. resided some months here after his expulsion from the throne of France. There is a Roman Catholic chapel near the castle, which possesses a fine copy of Raphael's picture of the transfiguration, and in the parish, the present proprietor, Cardinal Weld, has provided accommodation for the refugee monks of La Trappe. There formerly existed here a magnificent abbey church, of which little now remains. There was also a convent of Cistercian monks founded here in 1172, to whom the church belonged. There have been found here many ancient relics, principally British, and the remains of a triple entrenchment, enclosing about 5½ acres of ground, and commonly known by the name of the British camp, are still visible in this vicinity. It contains the hamlets of Gatemerston, Knoll, and Lullworth-St-Andrew. Distance from Wareham, 7 m. S.W. Pop., in 1801, 364; in 1831, 345. A. P., £1,660.

LULLWORTH (WEST), a chapelry in the liberty of Bindon, locally within the hundred of Winfrith, Blandford division of the co. of Dorset. Living, a perpetual curacy, not in charge, under the rectory of Winfred-Newburgh, in the archd. of Dorset and dio. of Bristol. Patronage with the rectory, and chapel ded. to the Holy Trinity. Here is a curious basin, called Lullworth cove, which communicates with the sea through a deep channel, and is surrounded with steep and lofty cliffs. There is also a natural arch about a mile from the cove, through which a view of the sea is obtained. The general aspect of the coast is interesting in a geological point of view. Many of the inhabitants of this part of the coast gain a hazardous livelihood by collecting the eggs laid by the puffin and razor-bill on these cliffs. It contains the manors and hamlets of Little-Bindon, Burngate, and Ham-burgh. Distance from Wareham, 9 m. S.W. Pop., in 1801, 312; in 1831, 360. A. P., £721.

LULSLEY, a chapelry and hamlet in the parish of Suckley, upper division of the hundred of Dodingtree, co. of Worcester. Living, a curacy, not in charge. Patronage with Suckley rectory, in the archd. and dio. of Worcester. Chapel ded. to St Giles. Distance from Worcester, 8 m. W. by N. Pop., in 1801, 131; in 1831, 128. A. P., £949.

LUMBY, a joint township with Huddleston, parish of Sherburn, W. R. of the co. of York. Distance from Ferrybridge, $4\frac{1}{2}$ m. N. by W. Pop. returned with Huddleston.

LUMLEY (GREAT), a chapelry in the parish of Chester-le-Street, northern division of Easington ward, co.-palatine of Durham. The Wesleyan Methodists possess two places of worship here; and there is an hospital endowed by Sir John Duck for the relief of 12 poor women. There are extensive collieries in this district, and the inhabitants are principally engaged in mining operations. Distance from Durham, $5\frac{1}{2}$ m. N.N.E. Pop., in 1801, 696; in 1831, 2301.

LUMLEY (LITTLE), a township in the parish of Chester-le-Street, northern division of Easington ward, co.-palatine of Durham. The earl of Scarborough built a spacious castle here in the reign of Edward I. It stands on the northern bank of the Wear, and is still in the possession of the Scarborough family. Lumley castle is however greatly altered, indeed little of the original building is still remaining. Distance from Durham, 6 m. N.N.E. Pop., in 1801, 249; in 1831, 393.

LUND, a chapelry in the parish of Kirkham, co.-palatine of Lancaster. Living, a curacy in the archd. of Richmond and dio. of Chester, rated at £6 18s. 4d., returned at £83 2s. 6d. Patron, the vicar of Kirkham. Distance from Kirkham, 3 m. E. by S. Pop. returned with the parish.

LUND, a parish in the wapentake of Hart-hill, Bainton-Beacon division, E. R. of the co. of York. Living, a discharged vicarage in the archd. of the E. R. and dio. of York, rated at £6 6s. 0 $\frac{1}{2}$ d. Church ded. to All Saints. Patron, in 1829, J. Blanchard, sen. Esq. Distance from Beverley, 7 m. N.W. by W. Pop., in 1801, 310; in 1831, 370. A. P., £3,742.

LUND, a joint township along with Cliffe, in the parish of Hemingbrough, E. R. of the co. of York. Living, a perpetual curacy in the archd. of Richmond and dio. of Chester, endowed with £800. Patron, the vicar of Aygarth. Distance from Selby, 3 m. E. by N.

LUNDY (ISLAND OF), in the hundred of Braunton, co. of Devon. It is situated in the middle of the Bristol channel, bearing $10\frac{1}{2}$ m. N.W. by N. from Hartland-point. It is about 3 miles in length, and almost a mile in breadth, and is inaccessible, on account of the lofty rocks, except by a narrow entrance, as it may be called, on the eastern side, which scarcely admits two people abreast. It contains about 2000 acres, not more than one-fifth of which (principally towards the south) is under cultivation. Plantations of trees have been attempted to be formed here with indifferent success, and some cattle are reared on the island. Rabbits and fowls are plentiful, but the numerous rats partly prevent their increase. The island rises to the height of 800 feet towards the northern extremity, and is terminated by a lofty rock of a pyramidal shape, called the Constable. This island was formerly the retreat of pirates, particularly one of the name of Morisco, who in the reign of Henry VIII. fled here after an unsuccessful attempt against the life of the king, and having fortified it strongly, contrived to live in safety for some time, till being taken along with his followers, he suffered the punishment of his crimes. During the civil war it was held out for the king, and in the reign of William it fell for some time into the hands of the French. Lundy appears to have been formerly much more populous, and the remains of St Anne's chapel are still visible. Rat island lies to the south, and the small rocks called the Hen and Chicks, to the north of the island. There is now only one family resident here. Lat. 51° N., Long. 4° 39' W.

LUNE-DALE, a township in the parish of Romald-Kirk, N. R. of the co. of York, contains a chapel-of-ease and a school endowed with £10 per annum, towards teaching 25 children. Distance from Barnard-Castle, 11 m. N.W. by W. Pop., in 1801, 307.

LUNT, a township in the parish of Sefton and co.-palatine of Lancaster. Distance from Liverpool, 8 m. N. Pop., in 1801, included in that of Sefton; in 1831, 67.

LUPPITT, a parish in the hundred of Axminster, co. of Devon. Living, a discharged vicarage in the archd. and dio. of Exeter, rated at £13 6s. 10 $\frac{1}{2}$ d., returned at £122. Patron, in 1829, John Eyde, Esq. Church ded. to St Mary. This was formerly the residence of the Mohuns, who were succeeded by the family of the Carews. There is an old fort, called Dumpton Fort, within the parish. Distance from Honiton, 4 m. N. by E. Pop., in 1801, 675; in 1831, 702. A. P., £8,094.

LUPTON, a township in the parish of Kirby-Lonsdale, Lonsdale ward, co. of Westmoreland. Distance from Kirby-Lonsdale, 3 m. W. by N. Pop., in 1801, 150; in 1831, 282. A. P., £3,355.

LURGERSHALL, or LURGASHALL, a parish in the hundred of Rotherbridge, rape of Arundel, co. of Sussex. Living, a rectory in the archd. and dio. of Chichester, rated at £8. LUTON, a parish in the hundred of Flitt, co. of Bedford. The market town of Luton, and the hamlets of East and West Hyde, Lee-grave or Lightgrave, Limbury with Biscott, and Stapely, are within the limits of this parish. The name is said by some to be a corruption of Lee-town, so called from the river Lea, which rises in the vicinity; and by others to have been Low-town, from its lying between two hills. Under William I. Luton was a royal demesne, and in 1216 Baron Fulke de Brent having obtained possession of it, built a castle within it; under Henry VI. we find the manor belonging to John, Lord Wenlock, who erected a chapel on the north of the church, and was afterwards killed at Tewkesbury. The portico of a splendid house which he did not live to finish, is still standing. It is, however, of a still more ancient date than the conquest, being mentioned as composing in the eighth century part of the endowment of St. Albans. The town, in 1828, suffered considerable injury owing to an inundation which took place on the 8th of July. Luton is under the government of a high constable and two day constables, who are appointed at the annual court-leet held by the lord of the manor. It is one of the polling places for the county members. There are fairs held on the 18th April and 18th October for cattle, and a statute fair in September. The market, on Monday, is well supplied with corn and straw-plait, which latter commodity is the staple manufacture, and is produced here of very excellent quality.—Living, a vicarage in the archd. of Bedford and dio. of Lincoln, rated at £36 12s. 1d.; the patronage and impropriate rectory was in the possession of the marquess of Bute in 1829. The church, ded. to St. Mary, is principally in the decorated and later styles of English architecture, but the north aisle is built partly in the early style. At the west end is a square tower built of flint and freestone, and in the east window is depicted the fight of St. George with the dragon. There are some curious monuments and an elegant baptistery chapel in the decorated style. The society of Friends, the Wesleyan Methodists, and the Baptists have places of worship here. Of charitable institutions there are—a national school, supported partly by subscription and partly by benefactions amounting to £81 10s. 4d. annually; a benefaction of £10 annually, expended in apprenticing poor boys; 12 almshouses, situated at the entrance of the town, and built in 1808 for the reception of 24 poor widows, who receive each annually about 10 guineas. Luton was the place of residence of the famous Lord Bute, who built here a splendid mansion, which contains an excellent collection of paintings. The Rev. John Pomfret, author of 'The Choice,' who died in 1721, was born here. Distance from Bedford, 20 m. S. by E.; from London, 31 m. N.W. by N. Pop. of the parish in 1801, 3095; in 1831, 5693. A. P., £4,605. Pop. of the town in 1831, 3961.

LUTTELEY, a hamlet in the parish of Enville, co. of Stafford.

LUTTERWORTH, a parish and market town in the hundred of Guthlaxton, co. of Leicester. The lord of the manor, so late as 1758, exercised the power of obliging his tenants to grind their corn at one of his mills, and their malt at another, but in that year a decision of the court of assize relieved them from this obnoxious relic of the feudal system. Lutterworth is worthy of notice as having been the parish in which Wickliffe, the first great English reformer, was rector from 1374 to 1387; he died here, and the townsmen still preserve in the church the chair in which he died, the communion cloth which he used, and his portrait.—Living, a rectory in the archd. of Leicester and dio. of Lincoln, rated at £26. Patron, the king. The church, ded. to St. Mary, is a handsome building, and was formerly surmounted by a spire, which fell some years ago. It contains a splendid oaken pulpit which formerly belonged to Wickliffe. The Independents and Wesleyan Methodists have places of worship in the town. There is a free school and almshouse, liberally endowed by the Rev. Edward Sherrier. A benefaction of £57 per annum by Robert Boles, and another of £14 by Margaret Bent, afford the means of education to 10 boys. There has also existed since 1607 an excellent institution for the purpose of lending small sums to tradesmen, which now possesses funds to the amount of £1,000, lent at 3 per cent. interest in sums of £50, for three years. The small river Swift flows past the town, which is well built and paved, by means of funds for the purpose, amounting to about £200 per annum. There is a market on Thursday, and fairs are held on the Thursday after February 19th, April 2d,

Holy Thursday, and September 16th, all for live stock, and the last also for cheese. A considerable manufacture of worsted hose is carried on here, and ribands also to a small extent. There is a spring in the neighbourhood possessing strong petrifying properties. The petty sessions for the hundred are held here. Distance from London, 89 m. N.W. by N.; from Leicester, 13 m. S. by W. Pop., in 1801, 1652; in 1831, 2262. A. P., £7,753.

Living, a prebend, rated at £20 0s. 10d., in the patronage of the bishop of Lincoln, and a discharged vicarage with the curacy of Caldicot, patron, the prebendary, rated at £8 2s.; under the peculiar jurisdiction of the bishop of Lincoln. Church ded. to St Andrew. Here are an endowment for the support of a warden, twelve poor men and two women; and a free school for five boys. Lyddington had formerly a market which is now disused. Distance from Uppingham, 3 m. S. by E. Pop., in 1801, 527; in 1831, 534. A. P., £4,131.

LYDE, a township in the parish of Pipe, co. of Hereford. Distance from Hereford, 3 m. N.

LYDFORD, a parish in the hundred of Lifton, co. of Devon. This place, under the name of Lyghatford, before the conquest had attained to some size, till in 997 the greater part of it was destroyed by the Danes. From the effects of this misfortune, however, it gradually recovered, till in the reign of William I. we find it rated as containing 140 burgesses, and its wealth estimated so high as to cause it to be taxed equally with London. In 1238, Richard, earl of Cornwall, obtained a grant of the forest of Dartmoor and the castle of Lydford, and about 20 years after, a weekly market and an annual fair were granted. In the reign of Edward I. it twice exercised the privilege of sending members to parliament. Lydford being the centre of a district the population of which was chiefly employed in mining operations, was early celebrated as a mart for tin, and in the reign of Ethelred II., money was coined here, some pieces of which still exist. Lydford-castle formed the prison of the stannary-court, and as such has been compared to the dungeons of the Inquisition of Spain; this tyrannical court, under the authority of the stannary code, assumed the right of trying and confining. Richard Strode, Esq., one of the members in 1512 for Plympton, for the crime of asserting the injurious effects of the mine streams on the harbour of Plymouth. This court is now abolished. The village is now almost entirely dilapidated, although towards the end of the 17th century, vestiges of the wall, &c., were visible; nothing now remains of the castle except the walls of the keep which measure 50 feet in length and breadth, by 40 feet in height. There are some very fine cascades in the vicinity, especially one formed by the Lyd precipitating itself into a chasm of the depth of 80 feet. The scenery throughout the parish is in general beautiful. It comprises within its limits the extensive waste known by the name of Dartmoor, which occupies about 130,000 acres, being about 20 miles long and in some places 11 broad. Its general surface is an undulating tract, rising in some parts to the height of 4100, and in others not exceeding 400 feet above the level of the sea. The stannary-court was formerly held on Crookern-Tor in the open air, and the seats used by the members of it were visible till within these few years. About 56 small rivers have their sources within the limits of Dartmoor, amongst which the Dart, Teign, Plym, Cad, Yealm, and Tavy may be mentioned. The soil throughout the district is not bad, and a right of pasturage is claimed by the lords of the surrounding manors; besides whom there are many people who pasture cattle on the moor on paying a rent of about two or three shillings per score of sheep or cattle. In 1808, a prison was built for the reception of French prisoners, capable of containing about 1600 men. The erection of this building caused a little town to spring up in the vicinity, which, however, has fallen to decay since the conclusion of the war. A communication with Plymouth is kept up by means of a railway for the formation of which an act was obtained in 1819. Tradition speaks of Dartmoor having formerly been peopled, and of the various wild animals of Great Britain having been very plentiful in the forest, in the pursuit of which a peculiar species of dog called the Slough-hound was employed. There is an annual fair held at Two-Bridges, on the first Wednesday after the 16th August for cattle. Living, a rectory in the archd. of Totness and dio. of Exeter, rated at £15 13s. 9d. Patron, the king as duke of Cornwall. Church ded. to St Petrock. Distance from Tavistock, 7½ m. N. by E. Pop., in 1801, 222; in 1831, 477. A. P., £1,610.

LYDFORD (EAST), a parish in the hundred of Somerton, co. of Somerset. It is, however, locally within the hundred of Catsash. Living, a discharged rectory in the archd. of Wells and dio. of Bath and Wells, rated at £7 9s. 7d., returned at £132. Patron, in 1829, John Davies, Esq. Distance from Castle-Carey, 4 m. W. Pop., in 1801, 143; in 1831, 166. A. P., £817.

LYDFORD (WEST), a parish in the hundred of Catsash, co. of Somerset. Living, a rectory, under the peculiar jurisdiction of the bishop of Bath and Wells, rated at £7 13s. 4d., in the patronage of E. LYE-WASTE, a chapelry in that part of the parish of Old Swinford, which is in the lower division of the hundred of Halfshire, co. of Worcester. The chapel was built by the Hill family, with accommodation for about 2000 persons. The Independent, Wesleyan and Unitarian sects have each places of worship here. The village is so called from its being built on the site of a waste, and is principally inhabited by workers in the numerous iron-works in the vicinity. A large quantity of nails is manufactured here. Distance from Stourbridge, 1½ m. E.

LYFORD, a township and chapelry in the parish of West-Hanney, co. of Berks. Living, a curacy, not in charge, subordinate to the vicarage of Hanney, in the archd. of Berks and dio. of Salisbury. There are a free school and an almshouse for ten aged people in this township. Distance from Wantage, 4 m. N. Pop., in 1801, 124; in 1831, 131. A. P., £1,226.

LYHAM, a township in the parish of Chilton, co. of Northumberland, 4 m. W.S.W. from Belford.

LYME-HANDLEY, a township in the parish of Prestbury, co.-palatine of Chester. Lyme-hall, the seat of the Leghs, is a fine building, of the age of Queen Elizabeth. Distance from Macclesfield, 7 m. N.E. by N. Pop., in 1801, 222; in 1831, 222. A. P., £2,668.

LYME-REGIS, a parish, borough, and market-town, within the boundaries of, although possessing separate jurisdiction from, the liberty of Lother and Bothenhampton, Bridport division of the co. of Dorset. It was granted in 774, by the king of the West Saxons, to the abbey of Sherborne, and, in Domesday-book, we find it divided into three portions, one of which belonged to the bishop of Salisbury, another to the abbey of Glastonbury, and the last to William Belet. Under Edward I., it obtained the privileges of a borough and pool, and was by him made part of the dower of his sister, the queen of Scotland. It provided for the siege of Calais a complement of 4 vessels and 62 men, but afterwards fell off for some time; but about the beginning of the 18th century it had the advantage of an artificial breakwater, which secured it a safe harbour. During the civil wars, Lyme remained in the possession of the parliament, and stood a siege by Prince Maurice. In 1558 it witnessed the first engagement with the Spanish armada, and, in 1672, a sea fight between the English and Dutch, which terminated in the defeat of the latter. This was the place where Cosmo de Medici died in 1669, on his visit to England. It is also famous for having been the first scene of the unsuccessful rebellion of Monmouth in 1685. Lyme is divided by the river Lyme into two parts, and will probably become a place of resort for bathing, as the lodgings, inns, &c., are excellent, and the country in the vicinity remarkably beautiful. Its trade appears to have fluctuated considerably at different times, but in 1829 it possessed 39 ships, the total tonnage of which amounted to 3835 tons. About 50 years ago, the customs amounted to about £16,000 per annum. The manufacture of woollen cloth is carried on to a moderate extent in the neighbourhood. There are markets held on Tuesday and Friday; and fairs held on 13th February and 2d October, for cattle, &c. The town was incorporated by royal charter in the reign of Edward I., which was confirmed successively by Edward II., Edward III., James I., Charles II., and William III. This charter vests the municipal government in a mayor, 15 capital burgesses—who are elected from the freemen—who have the assistance of a town-clerk, recorder, and other officers. The mayor and two burgesses, namely, the two preceding mayors, are ex officio justices of the peace. The second year after the mayor leaves office he is coroner. There is a quarterly court of session in January, April, July, and October, held by the magistrates, who have also power to hold a weekly court of hustings, which, however, they have not exercised for about 40 years. They also, as lords of the manor, hold a court in that capacity twice a year. Lyme began to send members in the 23d of Edward I., the mayor being the returning officer. The church is a handsome structure—ded. to St Michael the archangel—built principally in the decorated and later styles of English architecture, and consisting of a nave, choir, two side aisles, one of which was formerly dedicated to St Mary. Over the entrance is an apartment used as a school-room, with the date of 1720. There are places of worship for Baptists, Methodists, and Independents. The living is a discharged vicarage, a peculiar of the prebendary of Lyme-Regis and Halstock, in the cathedral of Salisbury, rated at £10 5s. 7½d., and in the patronage of the prebendary. There was formerly a Carmelite convent here, and there are now two almshouses, endowed by John Tudbolt in 1548. Thomas Coram, projector of the London Foundling hospital, was born here about 1668; as also the celebrated Admiral Summers, who discovered the Bermuda tales. Distance from Dorchester, 22 m. W.; from London, 143 m. W.S.W. Pop., in 1801, 1451; in 1831, 2621. A. P., £5,351.

LYMNGE, a parish in the hundred of Longborough, lathe of Shepway, co. of Kent. Living, a rectory—a sinecure—rated at £21 10s., and a vicarage, a peculiar of the archbishop of Canterbury, rated at £10 18s. 9d. Patron, in 1829, the Rev. Ralph Price. The church—ded. to St Mary and St Eadburgh—consists of a nave, chancel, and north aisle. There is a fund of £111 10s. per annum, appropriated towards the education and apprenticing of poor children, and also a small sum left by William Kingsford for the same purpose. Distance from Hythe, 4½ m. N. Pop., in 1801, 401; in 1831, 784. A. P., £3,569.

LYMINGTON, a parish in the hundred of Stone, co. of Somerset. Living, a rectory in the archd. of Wells and dio. of Bath and Wells, rated at £21 6s. 5½d. Church—ded. to St Mary—in the patronage of Wadham college, Oxford. Distance from Ilchester, 1 m. E.S.E. Pop., in 1801, 242; in 1831, 313. A. P., £2,705.

LYMINGTON, a market-town, borough, chapelry, liberty, and sea-port, in the parish of Boldre, east division of the New Forest, co. of Southampton. It was originally called Lentune, and afterwards Limintun, and is mentioned in Domesday-book under the former appellation. In the reign of Henry I., French wines and other commodities were imported here to a considerable extent, and large quantities of salt were manufactured here. The inhabitants formerly claimed the right of levying certain duties on articles imported, but this claim was set aside in 1529, at the instance of the port of Southampton. The decree, however, of this year was annulled in 1730, and the petty customs have since then been levied here without any opposition being offered. About 90 years ago, an embankment was formed a little above the town, which has diminished the channel of the river to such an extent, as to prevent all ships above 300 tons from entering, whereas the river was formerly navigable to vessels of 300 tons burden. The trade is confined entirely to the coast, no foreign cargoes being allowed to be landed here. Lymington formerly supplied the country with Epsom salt, which is now, however, manufactured to a great extent in Liverpool and other places. In this harbour about 40 or 50 vessels are usually anchored at one time throughout the winter season, paying a toll according to their respective rates of tonnage. The vessels of the royal yacht-club make this a favourite place of resort. There is a ship-building establishment here, in which some excellent vessels have been built. The market is held every Saturday; and fairs on the 12th and 18th of May, and 2d and 3d of October, for cattle, dairy produce, &c. The borough, which is so from prescription, was incorporated by James I., and put under the government of a mayor and an unlimited number—usually about thirty—of burgesses. The election of the mayor takes place on the Sunday after St Matthew's day, at which time also the constables, sergeant-at-mace, town-crier, &c., are appointed. Petty sessions for the E. division of the New Forest are held here once a fortnight. Lymington is one of the polling places for the members for the S. division of the co.—Living, a perpetual curacy, subordinate to the vicarage of Boldre, in the archd. and dio. of Winchester, and in the patronage of Boldre vicarage; it is not in charge. The chapel—ded. to St Thomas à Becket—is rather an irregular building, with a neat interior. The Baptists and Independents have places of worship here. Here is a grammar school, founded by George Fulford, who left a sum in 1668 for its endowment; twenty years after a school-house was built, which has since gone into ruin; at present there are ten boys annually instructed on this foundation, in the general elements of education. Besides this there are another free school, founded in 1773; a national school supported by subscription, and another at which 80 boys and as many girls are educated. Lymington is advantageously situated on a small river, and has of late years been a place of great resort as a sea-bathing station. Under the auspices of its annual visitors, a neat theatre and assembly-rooms have sprung up. In the neighbourhood stands a fortress, erected by Henry VIII., called Hurst-castle, which is now an important link in the great chain of forts built along the coast for the prevention of smuggling. This borough first sent two members to parliament in the 27th of Elizabeth. The present number of electors is 358. There are remains of a Roman camp in the vicinity. Distance from London, 86 m. S.W.; from Southampton, 18 m. S.W. by S. Pop., in 1801, 2378; in 1831, 3361. A. P., £5,316.

LYMME, a parish and village in the hundred of Bucklow, co.-palatine of Chester. The parish contains the hamlets of Brown-Edge, Heatley, Oughtlington, Reddish, and Statham. Living, two rectories in the archd. and dio. of Chester; one united with Warburton is rated at £11 0s. 7½d., and in the patronage of R. E. E. Warburton, Esq.; the other is rated at £11 0s. 5d., and in 1829, was in the patronage of — Leigh, Esq. The church—ded. to St Mary—is an ancient building, consisting of a nave, aisles, and two chancels; the tower was rebuilt in 1521. The two rectors divide the tithes and do duty in rotation. There is a free grammar school in the parish, endowed by Sir George Warburton and Wm. Doomville, Esq., in 1698, with an annual income of about £80. It possesses a water-communication with Liverpool, by means of the duke of Bridgewater's canal, which passes through the parish. In Lymme fustian is manufactured to an inconsiderable extent. It contains the seat of Robert Taylor, Esq., a fine old moated building, called Lymme-hall; as also Oughtlington-hall, belonging to the Traffords, an old Saxon family. Distance from Nether-Knutsford, 7½ m. N.W. by N. Pop., in 1831, 2305. A. P., £10,218.

LYMPE, or LIMNE, a parish, partly situated within the liberty of Romney-Marsh, and partly in the hundred of Street, lathe of Shep-way, co. of Kent. Living, a discharged vicarage in the archd. and dio. of Canterbury, rated at £9 1s. 4d., returned at £148. Patron, the archdeacon of Canterbury. The church is ded. to St Stephen, and built principally in the Norman style. There was formerly a Roman castle here, the site of which is now occupied by Stutfall-castle, which is the seat of the archdeacon. The name of the parish is derived from a branch of the Rother, which was formerly called the Limene. It is thought that Limne was mentioned by Ptolemy under the name of Aimin. The lord-warden of the cinque ports was formerly sworn in at Shepway-cross, which is situated about half a mile from the parish church. A nunnery was built here in 633 by Ethelburga, which afterwards became an abbey. There is a school and an almshouse in the parish with small endowments. It enjoys the advantage of a canal, which passes through it from Rye to Shorncliffe. Roman coins are sometimes found in the vicinity. Distance from Hythe, 2½ m. W. Pop., in 1801, 354; in 1831, 532. A. P., £3,954.

LYMPSHAM, a parish in the hundred of Brent with Wrington, co. of Somerset. Living, a rectory in the archd. of Wells and dio. of Bath and Wells, rated at £38 5s. 2½d., and, in 1829, in the patronage of Earl Poulett. There are a church—ded. to St Christopher—and a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. Here is a ferry over the Ax. Distance from Axbridge, 5½ m. W. Pop., in 1801, 334; in 1831, 521. A. P., £6,052.

LYMPSTON, a parish in the hundred of East Budleigh, co. of Devon. Living, a rectory in the archd. and dio. of Exeter, rated at £15 13s. 4d., and in the patronage of Thomas Porter, Esq., in 1829. Church ded. to St Mary. The Wesleyan Methodists and Unitarians possess places of worship within the parish. There is a small endowment for the purpose of educating poor children. The river Exe washes it on its west side. Distance from Exmouth, 3 m. N. Pop., in 1801, 883; in 1831, 1066. A. P., £3,377.

LYNCH, a parish in the hundred of Eastbourne, rape of Chichester and co. of Sussex. Living, a discharged rectory with the chapel of Farnhurst, in the archd. and dio. of Chichester, rated at £3 12s. 8½d., returned at £28, and under the patronage of Mr and Mrs Poynts in 1829. Distance from Midhurst, 4 m. N. by W. Pop., in 1801, 78; in 1831, 88. A. P., £588.

LYNCOMB, a parish in conjunction with Wildcomb, in the hundred of Bath-Forum, co. of Somerset. Living, a vicarage annexed to the rectory of St Peter and St Paul, Bath, situated within the archd. of Bath and dio. of Bath and Wells; it is in the patronage of the corporation of Bath. The parish is contiguous to that city, being merely separated from it by the river Avon. There are extensive freestone quarries in the vicinity, and excellent communication by water, by means of the Kennet and Avon canal. An hospital for idiots—ded. to St Mary Magdalene—exists here. Pop., in 1831, 8704. A. P., £18,546.

LYNDHURST, a village and township in the parish of Minstead, co. of Southampton. It is situated almost in the centre of the New Forest, of which it may be looked upon as the capital. The New Forest is said to have been formed by William Rufus, who converted this extensive tract of country, about 40 miles in circumference, into a hunting ground. The forest establishment consists of nine keepers, each of whom has charge of a walk, a bow-keeper, two rangers, a steward and keepers, and, finally, the lord-warden of the whole forest. There are still forest courts held at Lyndhurst by the wardens. This forest, as it was the scene of William's tyrannical oppressions, witnessed also his death. On the 2d of August, 1100, he, in hunting with Sir Walter Tyrrel and others, was slain by an arrow, which, glancing accidentally from a tree, struck him to the heart. There is still preserved at Lyndhurst, a stirrup which is said to have been used by him on that occasion; there is a commemorative pillar also erected on the spot. Living is subordinate to, and under the patronage of, the parish rectory, a curacy in the archd. and dio. of Winchester, not in charge. Church ded. to St Michael. There is also a chapel-of-ease here, and the Baptists have a place of worship within the township. There are a national school, and also one at which about 16 children are educated, endowed with £26 per annum. Sir John S. Copley, son of Copley the painter, and late lord-high-chancellor of England, was created Lord Lyndhurst in 1827. Distance from Southampton, 9½ m. W. by S. Pop., in 1801, 882; in 1831, 1236. A. P., £3,285.

LYNDON, a parish in the hundred of Martinsley, co. of Rutland. Living, a rectory in the archd. of Northampton and dio. of Peterborough, rated at £6 17s. 1d. Patron, in 1829, Samuel Barker, Esq. The church, ded. to St Martin, is a small Gothic building, and the burial ground contains the grave of the celebrated Whiston, of whom there is a portrait in Lyndon-hall. The Chater runs along the south side of this parish. Distance from Oakham, 2½ m. S.E. by E. Pop., in 1801, 93; in 1831, 102. A. P., £1,300.

LYNDON, a hamlet in the parish of Church-Bickenhill, co. of Warwick.

LYNEHAM, a chapelry and tithing in the parish of Shipton-under-Whichwood, co. of Oxford. Distance from Burford, 6 m. N.N.E. Pop., in 1801, 195; in 1831, 237. A. P., £3,221.

LYNEHAM, a parish in the hundred of Kingsbridge, co. of Wilts. Living, a curacy not in charge, in the archd. of Wilts and dio. of Salisbury, returned at £90. Church ded. to St Michael. Patron, in 1829, H. Long, Esq. Distance from Wootton-Basset, 4 m. S.W. Pop., in 1801, 833; in 1831, 1030. A. P., £6,627.

LYNEMOUTH, in the parish of Woodhorn, co. of Northumberland. Pop., in 1801, 12.

LYNESACK, a township in the parish of St Andrew-Auckland, co.-palatine of Durham, containing some extensive collieries. Distance from Barnard-Castle, 7 m. N.E. by N. Pop., with Softley, in 1801, 517; in 1831, 795. A. P., £2,996.

LYNN (WEST), a parish in the Marshland division of the hundred of Freebridge, co. of Norfolk. Living, a rectory in the archd. and dio. of Norwich, rated at £9. Patron, in 1811, N. N. Townsend, Esq. Church ded. to St Peter. Distance from Lynn Regis, $\frac{3}{4}$ m. W. Pop., in 1831, 396. A. P., £4,504.

LYNN (NORTH), a parish in the Marshland division of the hundred of Freebridge, co. of Norfolk. Distance from Lynn Regis, 1 m. N. Pop., in 1831, 54.

LYNN REGIS, a borough, market-town, and seaport, locally within the hundred of Freebridge Lynn, co. of Norfolk, but exercising separate jurisdiction. It lies on the eastern side of the Marshland, and on the Ouse.

History.—Camden is of opinion that the place derives its name from the old British word Lyn, signifying an expanse of water, thus referring it to its situation; Spelman, however, derives it from Lea, which is the Saxon for a tenure in fee. In Domesday book we find it mentioned under the name of Lun and Lena, as the joint property of the see of North Elmham and Canterbury. From this time till the reign of Henry VIII., it appears to have been under the peculiar jurisdiction, temporal and spiritual, of the bishops of Norwich, and to have been called Lynas Episcopii, but that prince granted it many privileges, and gave it the name by which it is now known. Henry I. granted it an annual fair, and in the reign of Richard I. we find it much frequented by Jews. In the succeeding reign Lynn distinguished itself for its loyalty to king John, and was in consequence created a corporation. The large silver cup then presented to the town is still preserved. It was subsequently visited by this tyrannical and weak prince for the purpose of removing his treasures, at a time when he was closely beset by Prince Louis of France. On this occasion it was, that crossing the sands he was overtaken by the tide, his treasures swept away, and he himself only escaped with life to die in the adjacent castle of Newark. The honours and privileges acquired in a bad cause do not appear to have been lasting, but we again find its charter renewed by Henry III. in 1221, as a reward for its continued loyalty. It was garrisoned for the interest of Charles during the civil war, and withstood a siege of three weeks by the parliamentary forces under the earl of Manchester; upon its capitulation, the inhabitants were compelled to pay a capitation assessment of ten shillings each in order to preserve the town from plunder.

Government, &c.—By the last charter, which is that of Charles II., the government is vested in a mayor, a recorder, a high-steward, 12 aldermen, and 18 common-councillmen, besides inferior officers. The election of the mayor takes place annually from among the aldermen, on the 29th August; he is elected by the common-council. The magistrates possess jurisdiction in all criminal cases except treason. There is a court of session held quarterly; a court of requests, for the recovery of sums below 40s., monthly, and a court leet for the election of constables, &c. yearly. This place appears to have sent two members to parliament in the 22d of Edward I. The right of election is now enjoyed by about 660. This is also one of the polling places for the members for the western division of the county.

Parishes, &c.—The borough contains two parishes besides Old Lynn, otherwise West Lynn, (which see). The living of St Margaret's parish is a perpetual curacy, in the archd. of Norfolk and dio. of Norwich, and is in the patronage of the dean and chapter of Norwich. The church was founded about the beginning of the 12th century, and is generally understood to be the largest church in England, not a cathedral. The spire, which was about 193 feet in height, was blown down in 1741, to the great injury of the body of the church; it is now, however, rebuilt.—St Nicholas chapel, which is a handsome Gothic building of the 14th century, is a chapel-of-ease to this parish.—The parish of South Lynn has a church in a regular cruciform shape, ded. to All Saints, the living attached to which is a vicarage in the archd. of Norfolk and dio. of Norwich, rated at £18 6s. 8d., and in the patronage of the bishop of Ely. The Methodists, the Independents, the Baptists, the Unitarians, and the society of Friends, have severally places of worship within the town. There is also a Roman Catholic chapel. In St James's-street there are a free grammar school under the superintendence of the corporation, and various other charitable schools, as also one taught on the Lancastrian system. There is an almshouse in All Saints' parish for four poor men; another, formerly a priory, founded in the reign of Stephen, is now under the two senior aldermen and others.

General description, Trade, &c.—The town is about a mile and a half in length, and was formerly fortified. It is well supplied with water, possesses a theatre, a subscription library founded in 1797, containing nearly 4000 volumes, a suite of rooms used for assemblies, and a mechanics' institution in a flourishing condition, founded in 1826. Lynn has long carried on trade to a considerable extent, assisted as it is by its vicinity to the German ocean and its capacious harbour, the entrance of which, however, is dangerous to a certain degree on account of the shifting sand-banks. It is capable of containing about 300 merchantmen at once. The tides, however, which usually rise about 18 feet, are sometimes so powerful as to drag the vessels from their anchorings. In 1829 it possessed 118 ships, the total tonnage belonging to the port being 14,659 tons. The coast imports consist principally of corn and coal; those from the Baltic of timber, hemp, and other Russian produce, and some wine, &c. is brought from Portugal. The custom-house, a handsome building of free-stone, contains in a niche a statue of Charles II., and on the king's staith-yard, or quay, is one of James I. The principal articles are those connected with ship building, and the exportations consist of agricultural produce, shrimps for the London market, and a large quantity of sand used in the manufacture of glass. There is a fair in October for cheese, and another in February, which lasts for about a week, called the Mart. There are markots held every Tuesday and Friday. Some remarkable vestiges of antiquity exist in the town, in particular the Lady's Chapel, a building in the pointed style of architecture, which was before the Reformation an object of particular veneration to pilgrims. There is also a fine tower built in 1264, which formerly belonged to the convent of Grey friars. There are few marks of the numerous religious houses which formerly existed in this place. Distance from Norwich, 44 m. W. by N., from London, 97 m. N. by E. Pop., in 1801, 10,096; in 1831, 13,370.

LYNT, a tything in the parish of Coleshill, co. of Wilts. Distance from Highworth, 1½ m. N. Pop. returned with the parish.

LYNTER (THE). See article CORNWALL.

LYON'S-HALL, or LEONHALES, a parish in the hundred of Stretford, co. of Hereford. Living, a discharged vicarage in the archd. and dio. of Hereford, rated at £6 10s. 7½d. Patron, the bishop of Hereford. Church ded. to St Michael. Pop., in 1801, 678; in 1831, 890. A. P., £6,355.

LYSS TURNERY, a chapel in the parish of Odiham, co. of Southampton. Living, a curacy subordinate to the vicarage, not in charge, returned at £30. Patron, in 1829, the Hon. W. P. T. L. Wellesley. Distance from Petersfield, 4 m. N.N.E. Pop., in 1801, 467; in 1831, 663. A. P., £2,586.

LYTHAM, a township, village, and parish, situated within the hundred of Amounderness, co.-palatine of Lancaster. Living, a curacy in the archd. of Richmond and dio. of York, rated at £22, returned at £120. Patron, in 1829, John Clayton, Esq., who is also lord of the manor. There is a free school for girls and another for boys, besides a Sunday school. About a mile from the village is the pool of Lytham, a remarkably fine natural basin, admirably adapted for the reception of ships. Of late years Lytham has been greatly resorted to for sea-bathing quarters, and has in consequence undergone many improvements. Distance from Kirkham, 6 m. S.W. by W. Pop., in 1801, 920; in 1831, 1523. A. P., £6,944.

LYTHE, a hamlet in the parish of Hoversham, co. of Westmoreland. Distance from Kendal, 6 m. S.W. by W. Pop. returned with Crosthwaite.

LYTHE, a parish and township in the east division of the liberty of Langbaurgh, co. of York. Living, a discharged vicarage in the archd. of Cleveland and dio. of York, rated at £10 12s. 6d., returned at £85. Patron, the archbishop of York. Church ded. to St Oswald. Here is Mulgrave-castle, belonging to the earl of Mulgrave, present governor of Jamaica, which is built on a declivity, and enjoys a most extensive prospect. There are some alum works in this parish, in the manufacture of which many of the inhabitants are engaged.

LYTHIAN'S (ST), a parish in the hundred of Dinas Powys, co. of Glamorgan. Living, a discharged vicarage in the archd. and dio. of Llandaff, rated at £6 1s. 8d., returned at £116 16s. 4d. Patron, — Dun, Esq. Distance from Cardiff, 6 m. S.W. Pop., in 1821, 108.

M

MABE, or LAVARE, a parish in the east division of the hundred of Kerrier, co. of Cornwall. Living, a vicarage with that of Mylor in the archd. of Cornwall and dio. of Exeter, not in charge. The church, which has a lofty tower crowned with pinnacles, is ded. to St Mabe. Patron, the vicar of Mylor. Here are an almshouse and a Wesleyan chapel. Distance from Falmouth, 4½ m. W. Pop., in 1801, 387; in 1831, 512. A. P., £2,383.

MABLETHORPE (ST MARY), a parish in the Marsh division of the hundred of Calceworth, parts of Lindsey, co. of Lincoln. Living, a rectory with that of Stane in the archd. and dio. of Lincoln, rated at £17 10s. 2½d. Patrons, in 1829, Colonel Waters and others. Distance from Alford, 7 m. N.E.N. Pop., in 1801, 164; in 1831, 242. A. P., £4,162.

MABLETHORPE (ST PETER), a parish in the Marsh division of the hundred of Calceworth, parts of Lindsey, co. of Lincoln. Living, a discharged rectory with that of Thedle-thorpe St Helen, in the archd. and dio. of Lincoln, rated at £7 10s. 2½d. Pop., in 1811, 24; in 1821, 35. Property has not been returned separately.

MABYN (ST), a parish in the hundred of Trigg, co. of Cornwall. Living, a rectory in the archd. of Cornwall and dio. of Exeter, rated at £36. Patron, in 1829, the earl of Falmouth. Distance from Wadebridge, 8½ m. E.N.E. Pop., in 1801, 475; in 1831, 793. A. P., £6051.

MACCLESFIELD, a hundred in the co.-palatine of Chester. It occupies the eastern point of the county where it projects into Yorkshire; comprises 12 parishes, 12 chapelries, and 59 townships, and, in 1831, contained a resident population of 123,349 souls.

MACCLESFIELD,

A market-town and parochial chapelry possessing separate jurisdiction, though locally situated in the hundred of Macclesfield, co.-palatine of Chester. The livings are two curacies in the archd. and dio. of Chester, one rated at £50, and returned at £122. Chapel ded., to St Michael. Patrons, the mayor and corporation. —The other rated at £150. Patron, in 1829, William Roe, Esq.

General Description.—The town is pleasantly situated near the southern extremity of the forest of Macclesfield, to which it gives name, on the west bank of the Bollin, over which it has two stone bridges and a wooden one communicating with some suburbs that lie on the east side of the stream. It consists chiefly of four principal streets, containing many buildings of a very superior kind; they are well paved, lighted with gas, and there is a plentiful supply of excellent water brought into the town from a neighbouring common, and by pipes conveyed into the houses. A public subscription library has been established here for better than half a century. Here is also a public news-room, and a handsome theatre with a suite of elegant assembly rooms.

Manufactures, &c.—The manufacture of twist bottoms, which at one time formed almost the sole business of this town, and for the protecting and promoting of which many legislative provisions were enacted, has been almost entirely superseded by the silk trade, which is carried on to a great extent. In 1766 the first silk mill was erected here by Mr Roe. At present there are upwards of 70 employed in throwing silk, which is manufactured into handkerchiefs, broad silks, twist, sewing silk, &c. In 1826, the silk trade employed in the town not less than 6000 looms; but such are the fluctuations of this branch of business, that in the following year they were reduced to 4000. The cotton trade was introduced here nearly at the same time with the silk, and has made a less rapid but more steady progress. Connected with these extensive branches of manufacture, there are numerous and large establishments for dyeing, bleaching, printing, &c., but the copper and brass works that at one period formed a prominent article among the staples of the town, have disappeared. Coal abounds in the neighbourhood, and there are quarries of slate and freestone, of which large quantities are sent to Stockport and Manchester, with the parts adjacent, and even into Staffordshire and other counties.—By the new Macclesfield canal, now nearly, if not entirely completed, this town communicates by the Peak-forest canal with Manchester, and by the Grand Trunk with London and the intermediate counties. The market day is Tuesday, and there are annual fairs for cattle, cloth, hardware, toys, &c. May 6th, June 2nd, July 11th, October 4th, and November 11th.

Municipal Government.—The corporation consists of a mayor, who is always lord of the manor, and 24 aldermen elected annually by the freemen. The mayor and three of the aldermen act as justices of the peace within the borough. Courts for the trial of misdemeanours are held by the corporation half-yearly, and by the mayor and justices daily for business connected with the police. The earl of Derby, as hereditary steward of the manor, holds here a court of record for the hundred twice in the year. A deputy-steward, who must be a barrister, a resident deputy-steward, who holds a court once a week, and a clerk of the courts, are appointed by this nobleman. A court of bailmote for the manor and forest is held along with the court of record, and by the same officers. Courts leet for the several districts are held annually within a month of Michaelmas, at which the constables for all the different townships are appointed. By the new reform act Macclesfield sends two members to parliament. The mayor is the returning officer. The number of electors is about 1100. This is also one of the polling places for the members for the northern division of the county.

History.—Being at an early period of its history the residence of the earls of Chester, Macclesfield was surrounded by a rampart, having three principal gates. It had also at one time a college of secular priests, founded in 1608 by a native of the town, Thomas Savage, who was successively bishop of London and archbishop of York. Of this foundation the chapel alone remains, a very interesting structure, containing a vast number of family monuments. During the contest between Charles I. and his parliament, this place suffered severely, having been besieged, taken, and held for the parliament, though several spirited efforts were made by the partizans of the king to regain it. In 1745 it was taken possession of by Charles Stewart, the Pretender, in person, but relinquished in the course of 48 hours in consequence of the approach of the duke of Cumberland.

Schools, &c.—Besides the established churches there are here one place of worship for the society of Friends, three for the Independents, one for the primitive Methodists, one for those of the New connexion, three for the Wesleyan Methodists, two for the Socinians, and one for the Roman Catholics. There is here a free grammar school of King Edward III., originally founded and endowed by Sir John Percyvale, a native of this place, and lord-mayor of London. The endowment exceeds £800 per annum. A school on the national plan is supported by subscription, and Sabbath schools are common among the several congregations belonging to the town. There is an almshouse endowed by a Mrs Stanley, 1703, with £6 per annum for three aged widows, with various bequests for clothing and apprenticing the children of the poor, too numerous, and some of them too insignificant to be particularised. The Porter family takes the title of earl from this town. Distance from London, 167 m. N.N.W., from Chester, 36 m. E. by N. Pop., in 1801, 8743; in 1831, 23,129. A. P., £30,305.

MACCLESFIELD FOREST, a chapelry in the parish of Prestbury, co.-palatine of Chester. Living, a curacy in the archd. and dio. of Chester, not in charge. Patron, the earl of Derby. Distance from Macclesfield, 4 m. E. S.E. Pop., in 1801, 215; in 1831, 279. A. P., £1,768.

MACFEN, a township in the parish of Malpas, co.-palatine of Chester. Distance from Malpas, 2 m. E. Pop., in 1801, 46; in 1831, 48. A. P., £515.

MACHEN, a parish in the hundred of Wentloog, co. of Monmouth. Living, a rectory in the archd. and dio. of Llandaff, rated at £16 16s. 5½d. Church ded. to St Michael. Patron, in 1829, Sir C. Morgan, Bart. Here are mines of lead, iron, coal, and calamine, several mineral springs, and the remains of an old castle, of which the history is utterly unknown. Distance from Newport, 5½ m. W.N.W. Pop., in 1801, 676; in 1831, 163. A. P., £2,702.

MACHYNLETH, a town and parish giving name to a hundred in the co. of Montgomery, North Wales. Living, a rectory in the deanery of Kewellion and dio. of St Asaph, rated at £11 10s. 7½d. Patron, the bishop of St Asaph. The town is situated on the small river Dyfi, near to its confluence with the Dulas, having the hill of Aran-y-Gessel rising behind it to the height of 2220 feet. The principal street is lightsome and spacious, having the market-house most commodiously situated at the one end. It possesses one excellent inn and post-house, several others less splendid, but affording comfortable accommodation, with many respectable private dwellings. The parish, divided into two townships, Isygarreg and Uchygarreg, contains a number of fine seats of resident gentry. Woollen is the staple manufacture, though lead mines and slate quarries in the neighbourhood give employment to many of the inhabitants. The market-day is Wednesday; and there are annual fairs the first Wednesday in March, 16th May, 26th June, 9th July, 7th August, 18th September, and 26th November. The unfortunate David Gam—the captain Fluelin of Shakspeare—was imprisoned here by Owen Glendwr, whom he had intended to have assassinated, but was liberated upon a pledge of never again taking up arms against Owen. The reply of this hero of the Leek to Henry V., who had sent him to reconnoitre the French army before the battle of Agincourt, is worthy of notice.—“Please your majesty, there are enough to be killed, enough to be taken prisoners, and enough to run away.” The poor fellow was unfortunately slain in the battle that ensued, and so saw not that victory which he so confidently anticipated, and which his bravery, no doubt, contributed to effect. Besides the established church, there are here places of worship for Baptists, Independents, Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists. Here is also an endowed free school. Pop., in 1801, of the town, 1118; of the entire parish, 1825: in 1831, of the former, 1657; of the latter, 2381. A. P. of the town, £3,518; of the entire parish, £6,243.

MACKWORTH, a parish in the hundred of Morleston and Litchurch, co. of Derby. Living, a discharged vicarage in the archd. of Derby and dio. of Lichfield and Coventry, rated at £9 8s. Church ded. to All Saints. Patron, in 1829, F. N. C. Munday, Esq. The gateway of an ancient castle, the seat of the family of the De Mackworths, which was demolished in the parliamentary war, is still standing in this parish. Distance from Derby, 2½ m. W.N.W.

Pop., in 1801, including the township of Mark-Eaton, 489; in 1831, 621. A. P., £6,596.

MADDINGTON, a parish in the hundred of Branch and Dole, co. of Wilts. Living, a vicarage in the archd. and dio. of Salisbury, rated at £60. Church ded. to St Mary. Patrons, in 1829, J. and J. Matron, Esqrs. Distance from Amesbury, 5½ m. W.N.W. Pop., in 1801, 327; in 1831, 381. A. P., £2,942.

MADEHURST, a parish in the hundred of Avisford, rape of Arundel, co. of Sussex. Living, a discharged vicarage in the archd. and dio. of Chichester, rated at £6 8s. 10d. Church ded. to St Mary Magdalene. Patron, the bishop of Chichester. Distance from Arundel, 3½ m. N.N.W. Pop., in 1801, 133; in 1831, 154. A. P., £1,027.

MADELEY, a parish in the north division of the hundred of Pirehill, co. of Stafford. Living, a discharged vicarage in the archd. of Stafford and dio. of Lichfield and Coventry, rated at £4 16s., returned at £94. The church—which is very ancient—is ded. to All Saints. Patron, in 1829, Lord Crewe. Coal is abundant in this parish. The village, sometimes called Little-Madeley, is a cluster of cottages and farm-houses in the old Elizabethan style. It has two free schools, one for boys and one for girls, endowed in 1645 with a rent charge of £60 per annum, by Sir John Offley, who the same year founded and endowed almshouses for 10 poor persons, each of whom has a salary of 1s. 9d. per week. Madeley is in the honour of Tuthury, duchy of Lancaster, and within the jurisdiction of a court of pleas, held there every third Tuesday, for the recovery of debts under 40s. Distance from Newcastle-under-Line, 5½ m. W.S.W. Pop., in 1801, 945; in 1831, 1190. A. P., £7,273.

MADELEY-HOLME, a liberty in the parish of Checkley and Tean, co. of Stafford. Distance from Uttoxeter, 3½ m. N.N.W. Pop., in 1821, 479; in 1831, 591. Property not returned separately.

MADELEY-MARKET, a market-town and parish in the hundred of Wenlock, co. of Salop. Living, a discharged vicarage in the archd. of Salop and dio. of Hereford, rated at £4 17s. 10d. The church—a handsome modern structure—is ded. to St Michael. Patron, in 1829, R. Kynaston, Esq. Madeley occupies a rising ground, and extends to Colebrookdale, celebrated for the lofty hills and hanging woods by which it is environed, and for its iron works, the most complete and the most extensive in England. Here is the celebrated iron bridge erected in 1779, consisting of one arch of 100 feet in span and 40 feet in height. It was cast in the works here, the whole weight of iron being 378 tons. Its appearance is admirable, adding a sublime feature to the scenery of that delightful glen. Near the entrance to this bridge stands the new market-house. The market-day is Friday; and there are annual fairs January 26th, May 29th, and October 12th. A navigable canal leads from the Severn to Ketley iron works, in the cutting of which several springs of petroleum or mineral tar were discovered. The famous John William Fletcher, John, so well known and so much admired among the Wesleyan Methodists, was vicar of this parish, where he died, and was interred in the church-yard in 1785. Distance from Newbury, 15 m. S.E.; from London, 148 m. N.W. Pop., in 1801, 4758; in 1831, 5822. A. P., £10,927.

MADINGLEY, a parish in the hundred of North Stow, co. of Cambridge. Living, a discharged vicarage in the archd. and dio. of Ely, rated at £6 9s. 7d., returned at £89 1s. 6d. Church ded. to St Mary. Patron, the bishop of Ely. The manor-house of Madingley is celebrated for its excellent collection of paintings. Distance from Cambridge, 3½ m. W.N.W. Pop., in 1801, 190; in 1831, 252. A. P., £1,173.

MADLEY, a parish in the hundred of Webtree, co. of Hereford. Living, a vicarage with the curacy of Timberton, a peculiar of the dean of Hereford, rated at £16 1s. 8d. The church—a spacious structure, having a crypt beneath the chancel, and an embattled tower at the west end—is ded. to St Mary. Patrons, the dean and chapter of Hereford. Here are held the petty sessions for the division, and here the Baptists have a place of worship. Distance from Hereford, 7 m. S.W. Pop., in 1801, 980; in 1831, 930. A. P., £5,930.

MADRESFIELD, a parish in the lower division of the hundred of Pershore, co. of Worcester. Living, a rectory in the archd. and dio. of Worcester, rated at £3 13s. 11½d. Patron, in 1829, the earl of Beauchamp, whose ancient mansion here, Madresfield-court, commands a most delightful view of the Malvern hills. Here is a school for six poor children, having a small endowment, the gift of Ann Ball in 1705. Distance from Upton-upon-Severn, 6 m. N.W. by N. Pop., in 1801, 153; in 1831, 191. A. P., £1,495.

MADRON, a parish in the hundred of Penwith, co. of Cornwall. Living, a vicarage with the curacies of Morva and Penzance, in the archd. of Cornwall and dio. of Exeter, rated at £31 5s. 10d. Church ded. to St Madron. Patron, in 1829, Henry Pennoek, Esq. The Wesleyan Methodists have here a place of worship, and here is a school for the children of the poor, endowed in 1704 by George Daniel with lands, and yielding now £180 per annum, besides a house and garden for the master. Distance from Penzance, 2½ m. N.W. Pop., in 1801, 1564; in 1831, 2058. A. P., £8,454.

MAENAN, a township in the parish of Eglwys-Fach, co. of Carnarvon, North Wales, situated on the Conway, and comprising with Maenan-house an ancient manor, the lord of which is Sir W. W. Wynne. Distance from Llanrwst, 3 m. N. Pop., in 1801, 355; in 1831, 352. A. P., £2,169.

MAENAN-MANACHDY, a portion of the township of Maenan on the Conway, claiming to be extra-parochial, the site of an abbey founded A.D. 1283 by Edward I., to which were translated the Cistercian monks from Conway, where they flourished till the dissolution. A mansion, built out of the ruins of this abbey, is still one of the seats of Lord Newborough.

MAENCLOCHOG, a parish, partly in the hundred of Dungleddy, and partly in the hundred of Kemes, co. of Pembroke, South Wales. Living, a discharged vicarage in the dio. of St David's, rated at £3 18s. 9d., returned at £21 1s. Patron, in 1829, — Bowen, Esq. The name of this parish is derived from an ancient cromlech, which was destroyed by the peasantry in the vain expectation of finding hidden treasures. Distance from Narbeth, 12 m. N. Pop., in 1801, 220; in 1831, 466. A. P., £623.

MAENOR-BYRR, or MANORBIER, a parish in the hundred of Castle-Martin, co. of Pembroke, South Wales. Living, a discharged vicarage in the dio. of St David's, rated at £8, returned at £31 4s. 11d. Patrons, the master and fellows of Christ-church college, Cambridge. This was the birth-place of Giraldus Sylvester, better known by the name of Giraldus Cambrensis, of whom there is still an effigy in the church. Distance from Tenby, 4½ m. S.W. Pop., in 1801, 451; in 1831, 582. A. P., £3,074.

MAENORDEWL, or MANORDIVEY, a parish in the hundred of Kilgerran, co. of Pembroke, South Wales. Living, a rectory in the dio. of St David's, rated at £9. Patron, the lord-chancellor. Distance from Llandilo-fawr, 2½ m. N.E. Pop., in 1801, 745; in 1831, 850. A. P., £2,305.

MAENOR-OWAIN, or MANOROWEN, a parish in the hundred of Dewisland, co. of Pembroke, South Wales. Living, a curacy in the dio. of St David's, not in charge, rated at £4, returned at £44 2s. 6d. MAENORFABON, or MANERFABON, a hamlet in the parish of Llandilo-fawr, co. of Carmarthen, South Wales. Pop., in 1801, 342; in 1831, 402. Property has not been returned separately.

MAEN-TWROG, a parish in the hundred of Arduwy, co. of Merioneth, North Wales. Living, a discharged rectory united with that of Festiniog, in the deanery of Arduwy and dio. of Bangor. Patron, the bishop of Bangor. This parish is finely situated near the conflux of the Falen-Dwyrhyd river, in the richly picturesque vale of Festiniog. There is in the village—which from the demand for labour in the slate quarries of Festiniog, immediately adjacent, is rapidly increasing—an excellent and a long established inn, a boarding-house of most respectable character, a handsome church, and a Methodist chapel. A Welsh poet of considerable celebrity, Edmund Pays, was rector of this parish about the beginning of the 17th century. He was the translator of the psalms used in the Welsh service, and assisted in translating the Welsh Bible. He died shortly after the year 1623, and lies buried in the church here. Distance from Tan-y-Bwlch, 1 m. S.E. Pop., in 1801, 593; in 1831, 745. A. P., £2,007.

MAGHULL, a chapelry in the parish of Halsall, co. of Lancaster. Living, a curacy to the rectory of Halsall, in the archd. and dio. of Chester, rated at £5. Patron, the rector of Halsall. There is here a small endowment for the education of the children of the poor. Distance from Ormskirk, 5 m. S.S.W. Pop., in 1801, 534; in 1831, 957. A. P., £3,797.

MAGOR, a parish in the lower division of the hundred of Caldicot, co. of Monmouth. Living, a discharged vicarage with the curacy of Redwick, in the archd. and dio. of Llandaff, rated at £7 1s. 0½d., returned at £45. Church ded. to St Mary. Patron, in 1829, the duke of Beaufort. The petty sessions for the lower division of the hundred are held here. Here is also a place of worship for the Baptists. Distance from Caerleon, 6 m. E.S.E. Pop., in 1801, 439; in 1831, 646. A. P., £5,842.

MAIDEN-BRADLEY, a parish, partly in the hundred of Norton-Ferris, co. of Somerset, and partly in the hundred of Mere, co. of Wilts. Living, a curacy in the archd. and dio. of Salisbury, not in charge, returned at £74. The church—which contains a finely executed monument to the memory of Sir Edward Seymour, Bart.—is ded. to All Saints. Patrons, the dean and canons of Christ-church, Oxford. A little to the east of this stands an insulated eminence of considerable height, sometimes called Cold-Kitchen-hill, sometimes Brimsdon, and sometimes Bidcombe-hill, on which are found tumuli, ditches, excavations, &c. &c., supposed to be of British origin. It is chiefly however worthy of notice, from the vast extent and beauty of the prospect which it commands. Here was an hospital for poor leprose women, under the care of some secular brethren, who were to provide necessaries and manage their estates for them. It was founded by Manasser Bisset, in the end of the reign of Stephen, or the beginning of that of Henry II., and ded. to the Blessed Virgin Mary. Hubert, bishop of Salisbury, about 1190, for the secular brethren, substituted a prior and canons of the order of St Austin. At the dissolution, it consisted of eight canons and — sisters, whose yearly revenues were estimated at £197 18s. 8d. Distance from Mere, 5½ m. N.W. Pop., in 1801, 611; in 1831, 659. A. P., £5,014.

MAIDENHEAD, a market-town and chapelry, partly in the parish of Bray, and partly in the parish of Cookham, co. of Berks, but possessing separate jurisdiction. Living, a curacy in the archd. of Berks and dio. of Salisbury, rated at £9 3s. 4d., returned at £128. Chapel ded. to St Andrew and St Mary Magdalene. Patrons, the magistracy of Maidenhead. The town, formerly called South-Ealington, afterwards Maidenhithe, now Maidenhead, stands upon the west bank of the Thames, over which it has a fine bridge of modern date, erected at an expense of £20,000. It consists of seven semicircular arches of stone, with three smaller arches of brick at each end. The town is comprised, or nearly so, in one street, extending from the bridge to Folley-hill, and forming the line of separation between the parishes of Bray and Cookham—the houses on the south side belonging to Bray, and those on the north to Cookham. It is well paved, and brilliantly lighted, and has many fine inns, being the thoroughfare from the metropolis to Bath, Bristol, and the west of England, and having between 60 and 70 coaches passing through it every day. The surrounding country is highly cultivated, richly ornamented with woodlands, gentlemen's mansions, and fine villas. A considerable trade is carried on with London by the Thames, which skirts the east end of the village. It consists chiefly of corn, malt, meal, and timber. The market-day is Wednesday; and it has three annual fairs, each of which continues for three days. The first commences on the Wednesday of Whitsunweek, the second on the 29th of September, and the third on the 30th of November. Horses, horned cattle, and pigs, are the chief commodities, and in that of September there are many servants hired. The government is vested in a mayor, a steward or recorder, and 11 burgesses, out of which burgesses two bridge masters are elected annually. The mayor is justice of the peace, coroner, and clerk of the market, and also judge of a court which he must hold once every three weeks, exclusive of the half yearly almshouses. There are here places of worship for the Society of Friends, the Independents, and the Methodists of Lady Huntingdon's connexion. There is a national school, endowed, besides subscriptions, with £60 per annum. An almshouse, for eight poor men with their wives, was founded and endowed by James Smyth, Esq. in 1659, with £40 per annum, to which Mrs Smyth added £8 per annum for fuel. Sir Isaac and Lady Pocock left large sums of money for various charitable and benevolent purposes, viz. in furnishing a number of poor families with weekly portions of bread, and especially 100 families with bread, meat, and coals, at Christmas. One hundred pounds sterling, every two years, to be divided in sums of £10 each, to the servants of good character, who shall have been seven years continuously in the same family, &c. &c. It is one of the polling places in the election of the county members. The tithes are included in those of the parishes of Bay and Cookham. Distance from London, 26 m. W.

MAIDEN-NEWTON, a parish in the hundred of Tollerford, Dorchester division of the co. of Dorset. Living, a rectory in the archd. of Dorset and dio. of Bristol, rated at £30 5s. The church, a large old building with a heavy embattled tower, is dedicated to St Mary. Patron, in 1829, the earl of Ilchester. There is here a fair for cattle annually on the 22d of November, and there is a rent charge of £21 per annum for educating the children of the poor. Distance from Dorchester, 8½ m. N.W. Pop., in 1801, 428; in 1831, 598. A. P., £2,005.

MAIDEN-WELL. See FARNFORTH.

MAIDFORD, a parish in the hundred of Goswold-Norton, co. of Northampton. Living, a rectory in the archd. of Northampton and dio. of Peterborough, rated at £8 8s. 9d. Church ded. to St Peter. Patron, in 1829, the Rev. S. W. White. Distance from Towcester, 5½ m. N.W.W. Pop., in 1801, 228; in 1831, 373. A. P., £1,469.

MAIDSTONE,

A borough town and parish, having separate jurisdiction, locally situated in the hundred of Maidstone, lathe of Aylesford, co. of Kent. Living, a curacy, a peculiar in the dio. of Canterbury. The church—reported to be the largest in the county, having a fine tower originally terminated by a spire, which has been burned down by lightning—is ded. to All Saints. Patron, the archbishop of Canterbury. In addition to this the original living, another curacy has been founded, and a new church built by the commissioners appointed by parliament for the erection of new churches, at the estimated expense of £13,000. This is also a peculiar in the dio. of Canterbury, not in charge. Patron, the curate of Canterbury.

General Description.—The town is situated principally on the east bank of the Medway, over which it has a bridge of five arches. It is comprised chiefly in four large streets, which are well paved and lighted with gas. The inhabitants are abundantly supplied with excellent water brought in pipes from a hill about half a mile from the town on the opposite side of the river. Among the principal buildings we may notice the county-hall, a neat modern edifice.—The new jail, erected a few years ago at the enormous expense of £200,000, enclosing within its walls 14 acres of ground, and containing 34 wards, in which are 450 cells appropriated to male, and 7 wards, in which are 82 cells, appropriated to female delinquents, besides a tread mill of such huge dimensions that 80 persons can be set on it at one time. Near the jail are the barracks, chiefly built of wood, which serve as a depot for the king's cavalry serving at the Cape and in the East Indies. The county hall-rooms were erected in 1819, and there is a small neat theatre which is opened occasionally. A very handsome building has recently been erected in the centre of the town, the lower part of which is appropriated to the corn market, and behind it is a market-place commodiously laid out for the sale of provisions in general. The chief manufacture carried on here is that of paper, which is made in large quantities, and of the finest quality. Here are also carried on manufactures of sacking and hair-cloth, block and pump making, rope making, seed crushing, iron and brass founding, &c. By the Medway, which is navigable for vessels of 60 tons burden, a considerable commerce is carried on with the metropolis, consisting principally of timber, corn, fruit, and hops. For the growth of the latter two of these articles the adjacent country is particularly famous, as well as for producing fine fat bullocks. The market day is Thursday. There is also a market for cattle the first Tuesday of every month, and there are fairs for cattle, pedlery, &c. February 13th, May 12th, June 30th, and October 17th.

Municipal Government.—The government is vested in a mayor, a recorder, 12 jurats, and 40 common-councilmen, who elect one another, appoint inferior officers, enact bye-laws, admit freemen, &c. The liberties of the borough combine the whole parish, with seven of the neighbouring parishes. The assizes for the county, and the quarter sessions for its western division are held here. Maidstone has sent two members to parliament ever since the 6th of Edward VI. The right of election is now enjoyed by about 1417 electors. The mayor is the returning officer. The freedom is inherited, acquired by servitude, and with the consent of the corporation may be purchased.

Schools, &c.—Here was an hospital called the New work, built about A. D. 1260, to the honour of St Peter and St Paul, by Boniface, then archbishop of Canterbury, which, with the churches of Sutton, Hillington, and Fereleigh appropriated to the same, was united, 19th Richard II., to the college of St Mary and All Saints, founded in the parish church here about that time by William Courtney, archbishop of Canterbury. It consisted of a master and several priests, who were endowed with £212 5s. 3d. ob. per ann. in the whole, and with £139 7s. 6d. clear, as Leland Collect. I. 97, or £159 7s. 10d. as Dugd. Speed.—Tanner's Not. Mon.

Besides the established church; there are here places of worship for the Baptists, the Society of Friends, the Independents, the Wesleyan Methodists, and the Unitarians. Here is a free grammar school, of which the master, who must be a clergyman of the established church, receives an annual stipend of £20, the rent of 16 acres of land in Romney marsh, with £6 a year from the purchase of the land-tax of the living of Hoo near Rochester, and a house rent free. To this school belong two scholarships in University college, Oxford. There has also of late been erected a subscription academy, the head master of which has £225 pounds a year, the second £195, and the third £60. The subjects taught are English reading, mathematics, Latin, and Greek. There are in addition to these, the Blue-coat school for clothing and educating 53 boys and 43 girls, endowed with a permanent income of £138 10s., besides donations and subscriptions.—The Green-coat school for clothing and educating 12 boys and 12 girls, supported by subscription.—The Brown-coat school for clothing and educating 24 boys and 24 girls, supported also by subscription and contributions among the dissenters.—Sir Charles Booth's school for clothing and educating 12 boys and 12 girls, endowed with the interest of upwards of £3,000, and the national Lancasterian school. There are six almshouses founded by Sir John Banks, Bart., 1697, and endowed with £60 per annum for six aged persons.—Six by Edward Hunter, Esq., 1748, for three poor men and as many poor women, endowed with £8 per annum to each of them.—Four by John Brencley, Esq., 1789, for four aged men, endowed with £12 per annum to each of them,—and three by a Mrs Duke for decayed gentlewomen. Woollett the engraver, who died 1785, aged 50, was a native of Maidstone, and in the churchyard of Maidstone lie the remains of William Shipley, Esq. the founder of the society of arts, manufactures, and commerce. Distance from London, 34½ m. S.E.E. Pop., in 1801, 8027; in 1831, 15,887.

MAIDWELL, a parish in the hundred of Rothwell, co. of Northampton. The living comprises the rectories of St Mary and St Peter in the archd. of Northampton and dio. of Peterborough, the former rated at £10 8s. 1½d., the latter at £4 17s. 1d. Church ded. to St Mary, that of St Peter has been long ago entirely demolished. Patron, in 1829, J. P. Hungerford, Esq. There is a petrifying spring here at a place called the Dales, and a chalybeate spring at a place called Scotland Wood. Distance from Northampton, 10 m. N. Pop., in 1801, 208; in 1831, 278. A. P., £2,595.

MAINSFORTH, a township in the parish of Bishop's-Middleham, co.-palatine of Durham, remarkable for a circular fortification upon an eminence, containing about 16 acres, round which the little river Skerne has been carried to form the fosse. It is supposed to have been originally occupied by the Romans and the Danes. Distance from Durham, 8½ m. S.S.E. Pop., in 1801, 55; in 1831, 39. A. P., £557.

MAINSTONE, a parish partly in the hundred of Purlow, co. of Salop, and partly in the hundred of Montgomery, co. of Montgomery, North Wales. Living, a rectory in the archd. of Salop and dio. of Hereford, rated at £4 13s. 4d. Living, a discharged vicarage in the archd. of Cornwall and dio. of Exeter, rated at £23 11s. 0½d. Church—the steeple of which serves as a landmark, and in time of war is used for a signal-house—ded. to St Macra. Patron, the lord-chancellor. The villages of Inceworth and Milbrook in this parish, formerly market towns, have each an annual fair, the former on the 1st of May, the latter on the 29th of September. The Wesleyan Methodists have here a place of worship. Distance from Devonport, 2½ m. S. S.W. Pop., in 1801, 3305; in 1831, 2637. A. P., £3,465.

MALBOROUGH, a parish in the hundred of Stanborough, co. of Devon. Living, a curacy to the vicarage of West Allington, in the archd. of Totness and dio. of Exeter, not in charge. Patron, the vicar of West Allington. In some parts of this parish lemons, oranges, olives, and citrons, flourish in the open air, with a little temporary protection in very severe weather. Here is an endowed school for eight children. Distance from Kingsbridge, 4 m. S. W. S. Pop., in 1801, including the chapelry of Salcombe Regis, 1056; in 1831, 1604. A. P., £6,396.

MALDEN, a parish in the hundred of Kingston, co. of Surrey. Living, a vicarage with the curacy of Chessington in the archd. of Surrey and dio. of Winchester, rated at £8 5s. Church ded. to St John. Patrons, the master and fellows of Merton college, Oxford. Merton college was originally founded here 1264, but removed to Oxford 1267. Jessop's well, a strong chalybeate, in this parish, was once in high esteem for its medicinal virtues, but is now neglected. A free school is supported here, and one on the national plan is supported by subscription. Distance from Ewell, 2½ m. N.W. Pop., in 1801, 210; in 1831, 209. A. P., £1,487.

MALDON, a borough, port, and market town, having separate jurisdiction, locally in the hundred of Dengie, co. of Essex. The livings are two, that of All Saints and St Peter, united, in the archd. of Essex and dio. of London, rated at £10. The church, a large and ancient structure, with a square tower terminated by an equilateral triangular spire, is

ded. to All Saints. Patron, in 1829, Rev. C. Matthew.—That of St Mary is a rectory, a royal peculiar not in charge. The church, a spacious building, founded 1056, by Ingelric, a Saxon nobleman, is ded. to St Mary. Patrons, the dean and chapter of Westminster. The town stands upon an acclivity on the south side of the Blackwater, which here uniting itself with the Chelmer, forms the haven by which at spring tides vessels drawing eight feet water can approach the town. Ships of heavier burden anchor in the offing, and discharge or take in their cargoes by lighters. The place is very ancient, and extends in one street from east to west upwards of a mile. Several small streets cross this principal one. A considerable trade is carried on here in coals, iron, deals, corn, salt, wine, and spirits, and there is an excellent fishery extending twenty miles along the coast. In the river here are taken up the so much famed oysters called Waldfest, of which large quantities are exported to the metropolis. The market day is Saturday, and it has fairs May 1st, the second Saturday of July, and September 14th and 15th. By the charter of the town, obtained in 1810, all previous ones having been somehow forfeited, it is governed by a mayor, a recorder, 6 aldermen, with 18 capital burgesses, assisted by a town-clerk, chamberlain, water-bailiff, &c. The mayor is chosen annually by the aldermen and capital burgesses, the aldermen by the mayor and capital burgesses, and the capital burgesses by the mayor and aldermen. The mayor, recorder, and the two senior aldermen, are justices of the peace within the borough. The corporation hold quarterly courts of session, and have power to hold one of record for the recovery of debts to any amount. The jurisdiction of the borough extends from the eastward of the Knowle sands 25 miles to sea. Along with the parish of Heybridge, Maldon sends two members to parliament, and is one of the polling places for the members for the southern division of the county. The mayor is the returning officer. Richard Gravesend, bishop of London, founded here, 1292, a priory for Carmelite friars, the revenues of which at the dissolution were £26 0s. 8d. The garden walls alone remain. An hospital for lepers was also founded here in the reign of Edward II., which, by Edward IV., was united to the abbey of Beleigh. Besides the established church, there are here places of worship for the society of Friends, the Independents, and the Wesleyan Methodists. The free grammar school was founded and endowed with £300 in 1608, to which was added a rent charge of £3 per annum by Mrs Anastasia Wentworth. Dr Plume, archdeacon of Rochester, a native of this town, and the founder of the Plumean professorship of astronomy and experimental philosophy at Cambridge, gave to it the farm of Iltnay in the parish of Munden, for the clothing and educating six boys of either parish. To the school he also added an excellent public library. To the building of a workhouse for the poor he also gave £200, and to employ them he gave £1,000 to establish a manufactory of sack-cloth. Distance from London, 88 m. E.N.E.

Pop., in 1801, 2558; in 1831, 3831. A. P. £8,940.

MALHAM, a township in the parish of Kirkby in Malham-dale, W. R. of the co. of York. The verdant dale in which this township is situated terminates in an immense crag of limestone called the Malham cove, nearly 300 feet in height. At a short distance from its termination the river Aire has its source in a lake about a mile in circumference, the superfluous waters of which seem to find a subterraneous passage whence they emerge at the bottom of this vast rock. In the time of a flood, however, the opening is not sufficient to allow the accumulated waters to pass, and they flow over the prodigious precipice with inconceivable grandeur, forming one of the most magnificent waterfalls in the world. About a mile to the east of this cove the same ridge of rock seems to have been rent by some terrible concussion of nature, and through the tremendous chasm a considerable stream dashes among the broken crags with horrid impetuosity. This latter is called Gordale Scaur. Malham has a place of worship belonging to the Wesleyan Methodists, and a free school with an endowment of £49 per annum, the gift of Rowland Brayshaw. Distance from Settle, 5½ m. E.S.E. Pop., in 1801, 262; in 1831, 259. A. P., £3,022.

MALHAM-MOOR, a township in the same parish, and bordering with the preceding. Pop., in 1801, 98; in 1831, 94. A. P., £3,253.

MALLDRAETH, a spacious estuary on the coast of the hundred of Maldraeth, co. of Anglesea, North Wales. It exposes a considerable tract of land at low water, through which flows the river Cefni, which might be embanked but for the inactivity of the inhabitants. Two attempts have been made under the authority of an act of parliament, but they have both failed for want of spirit and patient perseverance.

MALLERSTANG, a chapelry in the parish of Kirkby-Stephen, co. of Westmoreland. Living, a curacy to the vicarage of Kirkby-Stephen in the archd. and dio. of Carlisle, certified at £60, returned at £97. Patron, in 1829, the earl of Thanet. Wild-Boar Fell rises on the southern extremity of the township, and a square tower is yet to be seen at Castlethwaite, part of the ruins of Pendragon castle, built by Uter Pendragon in the time of Vortigern. The walls are 12 feet in thickness. The chapel having become ruinous, was in 1663 rebuilt by the countess of Pembroke, who endowed it with lands at that time worth £11 per annum, on condition that the curate should teach the children of the Dale to read and write, in a room built for the purpose over the west end of the chapel, in compliance with which about thirty children are taught. Distance from Kirkby-Stephen, 3 m. S.E. Pop., in 1801, 314; in 1831, 256. A. P., £1,453.

MALLING (EAST), a parish in the hundred of Larkfield, lathe of Aylesford, co. of Kent. Living, a vicarage, a peculiar of the archbishop of Canterbury, rated at £10 8s. 4d. Church ded. to St James. Patron, in 1829, T. G.

Burt, Esq. Here is a rent charge of £5 for educating poor children, and a school with an endowment for teaching 50 children, the former the gift of James Tomlyn, 1752, the latter of the Rev. Edward Holmes, 1781. A fair for pedlery is held here annually, August 6th. Distance from Maidstone, $4\frac{1}{2}$ m. W.N.W. Pop., in 1801, 1302; in 1831, 1543. A. P., £5,139.

MALLING (WEST), a parish in the hundred of Larkfield, lathe of Aylesford, co. of Kent. Living, a vicarage in the archd. and dio. of Rochester, rated at £10. The church—having a fine Norman tower at the west end—is ded. to St Mary. Patron, in 1829, Benjamin Bates, Esq. The town—situated on a small rivulet that falls into the Medway—consists of good houses built with a peculiarly red brick, and forms one spacious street, nearly half a mile in length. It has a market on Saturday, and three annual fairs August 12th, October 2d, and November 17th. Gundulph, bishop of Rochester, founded here, 1090, in honour of the blessed Virgin Mary, a Benedictine nunnery, the revenues of which at the dissolution were estimated at £245 10s. The west front of the abbey, still standing, forms an interesting and picturesque ruin. There is here a school with a small endowment, conducted on the national system. Distance from Maidstone, $5\frac{1}{2}$ m. W.N.W. Pop., in 1801, 1093; in 1831, 1369. A. P., £3,433.

MALLING (SOUTH), a parish in the hundred of Ringmer, rape of Pevensey, co. of Sussex. Living, a curacy, a peculiar in the dio. of Canterbury, not in charge, returned at £32. The church, founded by Ceadwalla, king of the West Saxons, and at one time collegiate, is ded. to St Michael. South Malling constitutes the head of a deanery, the whole of which is within the peculiar jurisdiction of the archbishop of Canterbury, who had formerly one of his palaces here. The college and deanery, the revenues of which were estimated at £45 12s. 5d., were granted, 37th Hen. VIII., to Sir Thomas Palmer. Distance from Lewes, 1 m. N. Pop., in 1801, 348; in 1831, 705. A. P., £5,018.

MALLWYD, a parish in the hundred of Mawddwy, co. of Merioneth, a portion of it also extending into the hundred of Machynllaeth, co. of Montgomery. Living, a rectory in the dio. of St Asaph, rated at £10 15s. 5d. Patron, the bishop of St Asaph. This parish is watered by the Dyff, which has here some beautiful falls, and it has at Cai Gwyn a spring celebrated for its efficacy in disorders of the eyes. Distance from Dolgelly, 9 m. S.E. Pop., in 1801, 960; in 1831, 1197. A. P., £8,816.

MALMSBURY, a hundred in the co. of Wilts. It lies in the north-west extremity of the county, bordering on Gloucestershire, comprises 26 parishes, including the borough, from which it takes its name, and, in 1831, contained a resident population of 12,592 souls.

MALMSBURY, a borough and market-town, having separate jurisdiction, locally situated in the hundred of Malmabury, co. of Wilts, comprising three parishes, St Paul's, St Mary Westport, and the Abbey, all in the archd. of Wilts and dio. of Salisbury. The first and second are rages, rated, the former at £8 2s. 1½d, the latter, having the curacy of Charlton united, at £16 17s. 8d. Of the former the church is dilapidated, the tower alone, containing the bells, which are rung on days of festivity, remaining. The nave of the old conventual church, ded. to the Virgin Mary, purchased at the dissolution of the monasteries by an honest clothier of Malmabury, William Stumpe, and presented to the towns-people, has served them for a church ever since. The church of the latter is ded. to St Mary. Patron to both, the lord-chancellor. The abbey seems to be without any ecclesiastical provision.

General description.]—The town is situated on an eminence nearly surrounded by two streams, which uniting at its southern extremity form the lower Avon. Over these streams it has six bridges, and it was formerly surrounded by a wall, parts of which are still visible. It consists principally of three streets, two of them running parallel to each other and the third crossing them both. The market-cross, a beautiful stone edifice with flying buttresses and a richly ornamented turret, stands near the centre of the town. The principal manufacture carried on is that of woollen cloth, which, after having been almost extinguished, has again revived, and employs now the greater part of the population. There are several tan works, one or two breweries, and a considerable quantity of bone lace is made by the women and children. The market day is Saturday, and with the exception of March, April, and May, large cattle markets are held on the last Tuesday of every month in the year. There are three annual fairs for horses, cattle, and sheep, March 28th, April 28th, and June 5th.

Municipal Government.]—The government is vested in an alderman and twelve capital burgesses, a town-clerk, officers, &c. Two members have been returned regularly from this borough to parliament since the 23d of Edward I., the right of election being vested in the alderman and burgesses. By the new reform act it henceforth returns only one member to parliament.

Abbey.]—According to Tanner, there was a British nunnery here in a flourishing condition, under the direction of the famous Dinoh, abbot of Banchor in 603, afterwards suppressed by St Austin under the pretence that the ladies had suffered themselves to be debauched by the soldiers of the neighbouring castle. It stood without the town, near the south bridge, on the way to Chippenham, where at an after period was set down an hospital for lepers. Maidulph, a Scottish monk, began in the seventh century a religious house here, of which his scholar Aldhelm was the first abbot. The monks here were of the Benedictine order, and by the liberality of successive kings it rose to be the most splendid monastic establishment in the west of England, Glastonbury excepted. Its abbot was mitred, and its buildings occupied 45 acres of ground, yet of these buildings all that remains is the nave of the church, which we have already noticed as serving for one of the dilapidated churches. Its revenue at the dissolution amounted to £813 17s. 7d. The earliest notice relative to this abbey church appears to be the statement of its dimensions, contained in the "Itinerary of William of Worcester," who wrote in the reign of Henry the Sixth. The account given by Leland of the state of the building in the time of Henry the Eighth is more interesting. He says, the abbey was "a right magnificent thing; where were two steeples, one that had a mighty high pyramis, and felle daungerously, in Acuminum meritorid, and sins was not re-edified. It stode in the middle of the transseptum of the chireh, and was a marke to al the countre about. The other yet standith: a greates square toure, at the west ende of the church." Both the towers which Leland mentions have been long since destroyed, leaving no traces of their forms or architectural characters. Indeed, so great has been the dilapidation of this building, that not more than a sixth part of it remains standing; and the preservation of this was owing to its being fitted up for the use of the inhabitants of the town after the Reformation. At that period it probably underwent some repairs; the east and west ends were walled up, some of the windows enlarged, the area paved, &c. The exterior and interior parts of the grand southern porch are elaborately decorated with sculptures. The former displays eight enriched mouldings, continued all round from the base on each side. The subjects of them are apparently taken from the history of the Old and New Testaments; and though many of them are distorted and ill designed, yet, as specimens of early art, they are very curious. The inner doorway, without columns, is also ornamented with sculpture. Below the arch is an impost, on which is a baso-relievo, which seems to have been intended for a representation of the Deity, supported by two angels. On the left hand of the door is a large piscine in the wall. On each side of the porch is an arcade, above which are seated six large sculptured figures, supposed to be designed for the apostles, with human figures over their heads in the attitude of flying. The western front is much mutilated; but enough of it remains to show that it must have had an imposing effect in its original state. In 1732, the doorway appears, from drawings, to have been perfect; but at present only one side remains. The running scrolls are gracefully formed, and resemble some Grecian and Roman ornaments. The only ancient sepulchral monument remaining is an altar tomb, placed within the chapel; upon it is a recumbent statue in royal robes, said to be that of King Athelstan, to whom the tomb has been assigned. But, if it was intended to commemorate that prince, it must have been erected long after his death, and on a spot distant from the place of his interment, which William of Malmabury states to have been in the choir beneath the high altar.

The historian, William of Malmabury, held the precentorship in this monastery during the reign of Stephen. The philosopher Hobbes was also a native of this town. Besides the established churches, there are here places of worship for Baptists, Independents, Moravians, and Wesleyan Methodists. There are two schools, one of them endowed with £10 per annum from lands belonging to the burgesses, and £10 per annum, a gift from Michael Weekes, Esq., 1693; the other endowed with £25 per annum by Mrs Elizabeth Hodges, 1725. One almshouse, in the patronage of the corporation, is endowed with £20 per annum; of eight others endowed with £40 per annum by Robert Jenner, 1644, the endowment has been lost. The family of Harris takes the title of earl from this place. Distance from London, 94 m. W. Pop., in 1801, 1571; in 1831, 2298 A. P., £10,851.

MALPAS, a parish in the hundred of Wentloog, co. of Monmouth. Living, a curacy in the archd. and dio. of Llandaf, rated at £5, returned at £55. Church ded. to St Oswald. Patron, in 1829, Sir C. Morgan, Bart. Here was a cell to the priory of Montacute in Somersetshire, the revenue of which at the dissolution was £15 6s. 8d. Distance from Newport, 2 m. N.N.W. Pop., in 1801, 178; in 1831, 211. A. P., £948.

MALPAS, a parish and township in the hundred of Broxton, co.-palatine of Chester. Living divided into two portions, the first a rectory with the curacy of St Chad, the second a rectory with the curacy of Whitwell, in the archd. and dio. of Chester, the former rated at £48 8s. 4d., the latter at £44 19s. 2d. The church—formerly a chapel to a religious house for monks of the Cluniac order, and built of unhewn stone—is ded. to St Mary. Patrons, in 1829, of the former, Mrs Egerton, of the latter, Sir T. T. F. E. Drake, Bart. This extensive parish, which is divided into 24 townships, formed one of the ancient baronies of the co.-palatine, the barons of which held capital jurisdiction. Agriculture forms the principal business of the numerous inhabitants. In the township of Bickerton, a copper mine has been recently discovered, but, we rather think, has not yet been wrought to any considerable extent. The township of Malpas has a market on Wednesday; and two annual fairs for cattle and pedlery of all descriptions, on July 5th and 6th, and December 8th. Besides the established church, with its two chapels at St Chad and Whitwell, there are places of worship for Baptists, Independents, and Wesleyan Methodists. Here is a free school, endowed with £25 per annum, one for 12 boys and 12 girls, endowed with the interest of £500, which has been incorporated with one on the national plan, where-in are taught 90 boys and 50 girls. Sir Randle Brereton, Sir Thomas Brereton, Hugh, earl of Cholmondeley, Thomas Poyser, Esq., and Miss Eliza Taylor, have each left considerable sums for the benefit of the helpless young, and of the still more helpless old. The latter left a sum which now brings £27 per annum. This parish was the birth-place of the excellent Matthew Henry, the everywhere known commentator on the Bible, and in the town of Malpas was born the amiable Reginald Heber, who died bishop of Calcutta. Distance from Chester, 15 m. S.S.E.; from London, 165 m. N.W. Pop., in 1801, 4,471; in 1831, 5,127. A. P. £90,574.

MALSWICK, a tything in the parish of Newent, co. of Gloucester. Pop., in 1821, 181; in 1831, 225. Property with that of the parish.

MALTBY. See RAITHBY.

MALTBY, a township in the parish of Stainton, N. R. of the co. of York. Distance from Yarm, $3\frac{1}{2}$ m. E.N.E. Pop., in 1801, 141; in 1831, 168. A. P., £1,393.

MALTBY, a parish and township in the upper division of the wapentake of Strathforth and Tickhill, W. R. of the co. of York. Living, a discharged rectory in the archd. and dio. of York, rated at £4 13s. 4d., returned at £30. Church ded. to St Bartholomew. Patron, in 1829, the earl of Scarborough. Here is a free school for eight children, endowed with £15 per annum. Distance from Tickhill, $4\frac{1}{2}$ m. Pop., in 1801, of the township, 527; of the entire parish, 600: in 1831, of the former, 752; of the latter, 844. A. P. of the township, £3,213; of the entire parish, £3,850.

MALTBY-LE-MARSH, a parish in the Wold division of the hundred of Calceworth, parts of Lindsey, co. of Lincoln. Living, a discharged rectory in the archd. and dio. of Lincoln, rated at £11 17s. 8d. Church ded. to All Saints. Patron, in 1829, the Rev. George Allott. Distance from Alford, 3 m. N.E. Pop., in 1801, 208; in 1831, 209. A. P., £1,468.

MALTON (NEW), a borough and market-town in the wapentake of Ryedale, N. R. of the co. of York, comprising the parishes of St Leonard and St Michael. Livings of both are curacies, subordinate to the curacy of Old Malton, in the archd. of Cleveland and dio. of York, not in charge. The churches are dedicated to the Saints whose names they respectively bear. Patron, in 1829, Earl Fitzwilliam. The town is situated on an eminence overlooking the Derwent, over which there is here a curiously constructed stone bridge, and which flowing through a most delightful and fertile vale, forms the boundary between the E. and N. ridings. Besides being agreeably situated, New Malton is extremely clean and well built. It extends lengthways better than half a mile, possesses a handsome suit of public rooms, with a neat theatre, and has a good trade in corn, butter, and hams, with manufactures of various kinds, such as linen, hats, gloves, pelts, &c. &c. The market-days are Tuesday and Saturday, the latter being the principal day. Fairs are held on the Saturday before Palm-Sunday, Whitsunday, and October 10th and 11th. The government is vested in a bailiff; and, in conjunction with the parishes of St Leonard, St Michael, Old Malton, and the parish of Norton, it sends two members to parliament. The bailiff is the returning officer. Here are held the general quarter sessions for the N. R. At the bottom of the eminence, called the Browns, is a mineral well, possessing the qualities of the wells at Scarborough. Besides the established church, there are here places of worship for the Society of Friends, Baptists, Independents, Methodists, and Unitarians. Distance from York, 18 m. N.N.E.; from London, 213 m. N.W. Pop., in 1801, 3047; in 1831, 4173. A. P., £10,646.

MALTON (OLD), a parish in the wapentake of Ryedale, N. R. of the co. of York. Living, a curacy in the archd. of Cleveland and dio. of York, rated at £16 13s. 4d., returned at £117. Church ded. to St Mary. Patron, in 1829, Earl Fitzwilliam. A priory for Gilbertine canons was founded here in honour of the Blessed Virgin Mary, by Eustace Fitz-John, in 1150, of which, at the dissolution, the revenues were estimated at £257 7s. There are still some remains of it adjoining the church. A school for Hebrew, Greek, and Latin, was, in the reign of Henry VIII, founded here by — Holgate, archbishop of York, and endowed to the amount of £100 per annum. Distance from New-Malton, 1 m. N.E. Pop., in 1801, 741; in 1831, 1204. A. P., £9,767.

MALVERN (GREAT), a parish in the lower division of the hundred of Pershore, co. of Worcester. Living, a discharged vicarage in the archd. and dio. of Worcester, rated at £8 3s. 4d. The church—an uncommonly fine Gothic structure—is ded. to St Mary. Patron, in 1829, Thomas E. Foley, Esq. This edifice has been designated 'another Westminster abbey;' and Mr Tatham, the architect, who was employed to survey the dilapidations in 1802, states, 'that in antiquity, magnificence, and beauty, it is little inferior, as a specimen of Gothic architecture, to any in the kingdom.' The nave, however, is Norman, but the choir, tower, and ornaments of the church, are in the most florid style of the pointed order. The building is of stone, 173 feet in length and 63 broad; the height of the nave is 63 feet; and the embattled square tower—in which are six bells and chimes—rises from the centre, to the height of 124 feet. Henry VII, his queen, Elizabeth, and their two sons, Arthur and Henry, often resided and took great delight in Malvern; and the abbey church was almost entirely rebuilt and greatly embellished under the direction of Sir Reginald Bray—a favourite of the king—the celebrated architect of St George's chapel at Windsor. The Anglo-Norman portion of the present edifice is however no doubt coeval with the original foundation of the priory.

General Description.—The situation of this place is most delightfully romantic on the eastern declivity of the Malvern hills. The ancient part of the village is very irregularly built, but the modern portion has many fine ranges of houses, and many beautiful villas, built in detached situations as private summer residences. There are here two medicinal springs, the one a chalybeate, the other bituminous. The former is in the eastern part of the village, near the church, the other, Holywell, is situated about two miles to the south of it. For the benefit of those who come to drink these waters, every accommodation has been made; baths, hot and cold, have been erected, respectable hotels fitted up and richly furnished, gardens planted, and beautifully romantic walks formed in every direction. For visitors whose habits are not locomotive, and for rainy days, an excellent public library has been formed. Here was a hermitage, endowed by Edward the Con-lessor, which by Aldewine, at the instigation of St Wulphstan, bishop of Worcester, was converted into a priory of Benedictine friars, and was for ages one of the most magnificent, rich, and influential religious houses in the kingdom. Its revenues, at the dissolution, were estimated at £375 Os. 6d. The parish church, which we have already noticed, the ancient gateway with the abbey barn, are all that remains of this splendid establishment. There is here a place of worship for the Methodists, and a Sunday school, and a school of industry are supported by subscription. Distance from Worcester, 8 m. W. Pop., in 1801, 951; in 1831, 2140. A. P., £7,358.

MALVERN HILLS. This fine chain of hills extends from N. to S. nearly 9 m., and in breadth from 1 to 2 miles. It separates the co. of Worcester from Hereford and Monmouth. The earliest allusion to these hills appears in the 'Visions of William, concerning Piers Plowman,' a poem, supposed to have been written about the year 1352. The name Malvern has probably been derived from the British words Moel (bald), and Wern (alders), or a bald mountain, with alders at the foot; moel also signifying a mountain. In Jones's 'Brecknockshire,' we find it stated 'Moel-y-yarn, which is pure Welsh, signifying the high court or seat of judgment.' The country in this district was formerly an immense forest. William of Malmesbury terms it a wilderness, extending from the river Teme on the north, to Cors forest on the south; and from the Severn, easterly, to the summit of the Malvern hills on the west. The manor and forests of Malvern and Cors, and the castle of Hanley, were granted in the reign of Edward I. to Gilbert de Clare, the red knight, earl of Gloucester, on his marriage with Joan d'Acres, the king's daughter. The forests having become the property of a subject, Malvern was called a chase, and Cors a lawn, by which name is now gone. Leland says—"the chase of Malverne is bigger than either Wire or Feckingham, and occupieth a great part of the Malverne hills. Great Malverne and Little also is set in the chase of Malverne. Malverne chase (as I here say) is, in length, in some places, twenty miles; but Malverne chase doeth not occupy all Malverne hills." Shortly after, a violent dispute arose between the earl of Gloucester and the bishop of Hereford respecting the bounds of the chase, and a trench—still to be seen, and called the duke of Gloucester's ditch—was made on the ridge of the hills, to settle the boundary. After passing through various hands, Malvern chase came into the possession of Richard III., when duke of Gloucester, on his marriage with a daughter of Richard Neville, earl of Warwick. In 1630, Charles I. granted the forest or chase to Sir Robert Heath and three others, but in consequence of some disputes, it was disafforested in the following year. The manor is now the property of Lord Foley. Perhaps the most interesting feature in this remarkable chain is the 'Herefordshire Beacon,' in former ages, a hill-fortress of great strength and importance. The hills stretch from north to south, about nine miles, almost in a straight line. The three principal eminences are, the North hill, the Worcestershire beacon, and the Herefordshire beacon, which stands about the middle of the range. We find considerable discrepancy in the accounts of their height. The ordnance survey—probably the most accurate—states the Herefordshire beacon to be 1444 feet above the level of the sea; the Worcestershire beacon, according to Nash, is 33 feet higher than the preceding. The following passage is taken from King's 'Monumenta Antiqua,' p. 147.—"There are a vast number of strong entrenchments in all parts of this island, situate chiefly on the tops of natural hills, and which can be attributed to none of the various people who have ever dwelt in the adjacent country, except to the ancient Britons, although, indeed, the subsequent conquerors, Romans, Saxons, and Danes, and even the Normans, have, on certain emergencies, made use of them on account of their great original strength; and although erroneous and hasty conjectures, and even the crude reports of the country have often called them Roman, Danish, or Saxon, yet can they only be attributed to the ancient Britons. One of the most important and considerable of these fortified places, is situated on a spot that could not fail to be an object of the utmost attention to the original inhabitants of these territories; this is the Herefordshire beacon, commanding that which was the only pass through the Malvern ridge of hills, and which is indeed very nearly so to the present hour. The Worcestershire and Herefordshire beacons appear much higher than in fact they really are."

MALVERN (LITTLE), a parish in the lower division of the hundred of Oswaldslow, co. of Worcester. Living, a curacy in the archd. and dio. of Worcester, not in charge, returned at £15. The church—which forms an interesting ruin—is ded. to St Giles. Patroness, in 1829, Mrs Wakeman. Here was a priory of Benedictines, a cell to the abbey of Worcester. At the dissolution it had a prior and seven monks, whose revenue was estimated at £102 10s. 9d. The ruins of the parish church, and a small portion of building adjoining to it, occupied as a dwelling-house, are all that remains of the establishment. Distance from Upton-upon-Severn, 5½ m. W.N.W. Pop., in 1801, 34; in 1831, 88. A. P., £582.

MAMBLE, a parish in the lower division of the hundred of Doddingtree, co. of Worcester. Living, a discharged vicarage in the archd. of Salop and dio. of Hereford, rated at £9 4s. 7d., returned at £132 15s. Church ded. to St John Patron, the lord-chancellor. Coals are abundant in this parish. Here stands Sodington, the ancient seat of the Blounts, beneath the foundations of which, in 1807, a number of Roman coins were discovered. An entire Roman brick kiln, parts of a considerable aqueduct, and a pavement, the work of that people, had been previously discovered in the neighbourhood. Distance from Bewdley, 6 m. W.S.W. Pop., in 1801, 338; in 1831, 355. A. P., £2,903.

MAMHEAD, a parish in the hundred of Exminster, co. of Devon. Living, a discharged rectory in the archd. and dio. of Exeter, rated at £10 17s. 6d. Patronage at present in the crown, by reason of lunacy. On Mamhead point is an obelisk of Portland stone 100 feet in height, erected by the proprietor of Mamhead-house, in whose grounds are a number of rare exotics, introduced by him from the continent. Distance from Chudleigh, $\frac{1}{2}$ m. E.N.E. Pop., in 1801, 230; in 1881, 330.

MAMHILAD, a parish in the upper division of the hundred of Abergavenny, co. of Monmouth. Living, a curacy united with that of Travenith to the vicarage of Llanover, in the archd. and dio. of Llandaff, rated at £9. Patron, the vicar of Llanover. Distance from Usk, 5 m. N.W. by W. Pop., in 1801, 209; in 1831, 277. A. P., £1,599.

MAMHOLE, a hamlet in the parish of Bedwelty, co. of Monmouth. Here are extensive coal and iron works. Pop., in 1801, 1230; in 1831, 3208. Property not returned separately.

MAM-TOR (THE). See CASTLETON.

M A N,

A considerably extensive and populous island in the Irish channel, about 30 miles W. of St Bees-Head, Cumberland, 16 m. S. of Burrow-Head in Scotland, and 27 m. E. of Strangford in Ireland, the central point of the island being $54^{\circ} 16'$ N. lat., and about 5° W. long. Its extreme length from N.E. to S.W. is about 30 miles, and its extreme breadth in the opposite direction 12 miles, its circumference being about 80 miles.

Mountains.—A mountainous ridge, running nearly across the island from N.E. to S.W., divides it into two unequal portions of what may be generally termed arable land, the largest portion lying to the N.W., the smallest lying also lengthways to the S.E. The most considerable peak is Seafield, the height of which is 1795 feet above the level of the sea. North and South Barrule, and Pennypot, are little inferior. Their sides, a considerable way upwards, are covered with turbary or turf, and with rushes, heath, and mosses of different kinds, to their summits. Some of them are marshy, and even in dry weather difficult of access.

Streams.—Numerous streams fall from these mountains, but none of them have length of course to attain the magnitude of rivers. The principal of them are the Douglas, Ramsey, Laxey, Castletown, and Peel, all forming havens, to which they give, or perhaps, from which they take their names, where they fall into the sea. The four first fall into the sea on the E., and the last on the W. side of the island. There are numberless streams besides those we have specified, each of which is capable of turning a mill; all of them abound in fine trout.

Soil.—The northern part of the island consists of sand resting on clay; throughout the greater part of the substratum is marle, and the mountains are principally composed of strata of clay-slate interspersed with veins of quartz. Copper and lead ores are the principal minerals, considerable quantities of which are dug out of the mines at Laxey, Foxdale, and Bradahead, near port Erin. All mines belong by prerogative to the lord proprietor of the soil, who, having let them in lease, reserves as his due one-tenth of the gross produce. A little brushwood, and abundance of furze, is found on the uncultivated hills, and in some places may be seen thriving plantations and luxuriant shrubberies, but there is neither park nor forest scenery to be met with in the island.

Climate.—The climate in winter is milder than on any of the neighbouring coasts. Frosts rarely commence before Christmas, and even then are so slight, as to impede vegetation in a small degree. Snow seldom falls, and never lies for any length of time. Gales of wind and heavy rains are frequent in winter and spring.

Crops and Cattle.—Barley, oats, and wheat form the principal crops, and are produced in considerable quantities and of good quality, all over the island. Potatoes are extensively cultivated, and turnips, for which the soil seems to be peculiarly adapted. Flax is grown, but not in sufficient quantity to supply even the home demand. Most of the artificial grasses thrive well. The light plough is generally preferred, and is procured either from England or Scotland, or made on the island. Clay, upon the thin sand soils, is found to be an excellent manure. Marle of good quality can be dug from almost every farm in the north of the island; sea-weed is extensively used all round the island. Sheep are turned to graze upon the commons or uncultivated lands, which form a third part of the island. During the winter season the evergreen furze forms the principal part of their food. The native breed of horses is small but hardy, easily fed, and patient of labour. The horned cattle are numerous, but, though some of them are good milchers, in general they are more adapted for fattening than for the dairy. The breed has, however, begun to be greatly improved by the introduction of the Dunlop and short-horned cattle. The native breed of sheep is small and hardy, their wool neither very long nor very fine, but their mutton is excellent. Pigs are bred in great numbers, every cottager keeping one or two. Poultry of all kinds is abundant and cheap. Farms are of various dimensions, from the cottage with its small field for a cow's grass up to 800 acres; enclosures are made with earth, raised to the height of four or five feet, and planted on the top with furze. Dry or unencemented stone fences are also common. Farm houses are roofed with slate, cottages with thatch. Many of the latter are built with nodas. Every inhabitant has a right to quarry stones for his own use, and on paying annually one half-penny to the lord, of digging peat upon the mountains. Immense numbers of sea-fowl frequent the rocks on the coast, especially in the breeding season. Rabbits and hares are the only wild animals found here; also hawks, which in the days of falconry were considered of a very superior kind. Reptiles of a noxious kind are unknown in the island.

Fisheries.—Fish are plentiful on the coast, especially herrings, the catching and curing of which forms the most important part of the industry of the inhabitants. In this business, which commences in July and continues till the end of October, from 200 to 300 boats of from 15 to 30 tons burden are employed. They are mostly without decks. They leave the shore in the evening, regularly returning with their cargoes in the morning. It was long the practice of the fishermen to join in public prayers before leaving the shore, and on no account will they go out on the Saturday or the Sabbath evenings. A flight of gulls generally hovers over a shoal of herrings, which serves as an index to the fishermen, and to shoot one of these birds in the fishing season, subjects the perpetrator to a very considerable fine. Women and children are in great numbers awaiting the return of the boats in the morning, to carry the herrings to the receiving-houses, where they are instantly salted. The white are regularly packed in barrels, with a layer of salt between each row; those intended for red are rubbed with salt—or royled, as they technically term it—in which they remain for two or three days, after which they are washed and hung up upon rods suspended from the ceiling, a few feet from the floor, where fires of wood are kept constantly burning till they are sufficiently dried, when they are packed up for exportation.

State of the Population.—The natives are a shrewd intelligent people, and several of them have risen to great eminence both in the army and navy, among whom we may notice the late Col. Wilks, who was governor of St Helena when Buonaparte was sent there; and of five mayors of Liverpool, who have been knighted, two of them were Marxmen. Many of them have also realized vast fortunes both in the island and abroad. They are strongly attached to their native mountains, as well as to their ancient laws and customs, which they in general imagine to be the most equitable that have been devised by the most profound lawgivers, and the most praise-worthy which have been practised by any people. Their language is a dialect of the Erse, or Celtic, though the English is pretty generally understood. In the towns it may be said to be universally so.

Ecclesiastical Affairs.—The established religion is that of the church of England, by the ministers of which alone marriage can be lawfully or legally solemnized. All Christian sects are tolerated, and their ministers are competent to perform all religious offices that of marriage excepted. In ecclesiastical affairs the island is under the control of the bishop, an archdeacon, two vicars-general, and an episcopal registrar. The see, according to Camden, was founded at Sodor in the island of I, or Icolmkill, in the sixth century by Pope Gregory IV., and in 1098 the island of Man, being by Magnus king of Norway seized upon, along with the western isles of Scotland, was by him also included in the same diocese. Man fell into the hands of the English 1333, since which the bishop has had nothing to do with Sodor, save that nominally he has retained the title, being to this day styled bishop of Sodor and Man. He is a suffragan of the archbishop of York, and exercises the same spiritual powers, and possesses the same privileges, except that of voting in the upper house of parliament, where he is allowed a seat, in which seat the late Queen was placed when on her trial. The island is divided into 17 parishes, the services being performed in the most of them alternately in the Manks and English languages. In every parish there is a school, in some of them two, all of them endowed less or more. In addition, most of them possess a small library.

Towns.—There are four sea-port and market-towns upon the island—Castletown, Douglas, Peel, and Ramsey.

Castletown.—Castletown being the seat of government is considered the capital. It is situated near the southern extremity of the island, on the western shore of Castletown-bay, opposite to Longness-point, and is supposed to be the most ancient town of the island. The houses, however, appear to be mostly modern, are neatly built, and the streets are regular and well-paved. Here stands the castle of Rushen, from which the town takes its name, and near to which there is a spacious area forming a convenient market-place. An excellent and commodious market-house has lately been built, having over it a handsome assembly-room, which is now converted into a dissenting place of worship; and there is a good subscription library which is well supported. Here has recently been founded, by the Hon. Cornelius Smelt, lieutenant-governor, Dr Ward, the bishop of the diocese, and other trustees upon a bequest granted by Bishop Barrow, 1668, for the promotion of sound learning, &c., a college, which they have named King William's college, in which the course of studies forms a complete and general system of education. The principal and professors, with the exception of oriental and modern languages, must be members of the church of England and graduates of one of the universities. The masters are allowed to receive students as boarders under certain regulations, and every student must contribute a small sum per quarter to the college funds, and a fee at his entry, to be appropriated to the formation of a library, for which a large hall has been fitted up in the new building. A national school, in which there are between two and three hundred scholars, is supported by subscription, besides a charity school for 20 boys, supported from the parish funds, and a free school endowed with £25 per annum. Here is the house of the keys, the Tinwald, from which the laws are proclaimed, and a high-bailiffship, which includes the parishes of Kirk-Christ-Rushen, Kirk-Arbory, Kirk-Santon, and Kirk-Malew. The bay is here, from the numerous sunken rocks, difficult of access, in consequence of which, most of the trade of the town is carried on by Derby-haven, which lies

Douglas.—Douglas is situated near the centre of the east coast, on the south side of a large semicircular bay of the same name, so called from the rivulets Dhoo and Glass, which, uniting their waters, fall into it in one stream. It is of a triangular form, the streets inconveniently narrow, and the houses are without order or uniformity of appearance, though of late it has been greatly improved, especially by the addition of several streets regularly formed, with many houses of elegant appearance. The pier forms a most delightful and well-frequented promenade. To the south rises a range of hills called the How of Douglas. On the north-east are seen the cliff of Clay-head, the mountains of Seafield and Pennypot, with the spacious intervening bay, to the right of which rises in long extent the Cumberland coast, crowned with distant mountains; and from the summit of Douglas head, a little more to the right, the highlands of Wales are distinctly seen. Than the approach to this town from the sea nothing can be more beautiful. The fine bay skirted with the town, and the county rising behind it in the form of a vast and magnificent amphitheatre, form a delightful landscape rarely to be met with. About half a mile north of the town stands Castle Mona, built by the late duke of Athol at an expense of £30,000. It is built of a fine white stone brought from the island of Arran, and, with 170 acres of land surrounding it, was lately sold for £16,000, and converted into a hotel. The former residence of the Athol family, situated on the quay, is now occupied as the custom-house. The salubrity of the air, the fine beach, and the cheapness of all the necessities of life, have rendered Douglas a favourite resort for sea-bathing during the summer season, for the convenience of which it is agreeably and abundantly furnished. Bathing machines, hot baths, elegant hotels, commodious lodgings, assembly-rooms, billiard-rooms, news-rooms, and libraries, have all been prepared for the comfortable accommodation of those who choose to renovate their constitutions by a temporary seclusion in this delightful island.

Trade.—A considerable trade is carried on from this port with the neighbouring coasts, and ship-building, especially of light vessels, is here carried on to a considerable extent. The post-office for the whole island is established here, and letters are brought by the steam-packets three times a week during summer, and once during winter. There are two steam-packets from Douglas to Liverpool direct every other day during the summer months, performing the voyage, 72 m., in eight hours. The Glasgow and Liverpool steam vessels touch at this port daily, and those from Whitehaven to Dublin regularly on the Saturdays and the Mondays. The market, which is plentifully supplied with all manner of provisions, is on Saturday, and there is an annual fair for cattle November 12th. This is the seat of the Deemster's court as often as it is found to be necessary. It is also a high-bailiff-ship, which extends over the parishes of Kirk-Braddan, Kirk-Onchan, Kirk-Lonan, and Kirk-Marown. The parish church—Kirk-Braddan—stands two miles on the road to Peel, and in the town there are three chapels, St Matthew's, St George's, and St Barnabas', all neat buildings, the latter especially worthy of notice. Here are besides places of worship for the Independents, the Primitive and Wesleyan Methodists, and the Roman Catholics, and lately a building has been erected and clergymen obtained in connection with the church of Scotland. A school on the national plan is supported by subscription. Pop., in 1821, 6054.

Peel.—Peel, anciently called Helme-Town, stands on the west coast, 10 miles to the north-west of Douglas and 12 north from Castle-town. It is chiefly remarkable for the remains of an ancient castle and cathedral church, to which it unquestionably owed its early importance. During the time of the island's independence its trade was considerable, it being the grand resort of the smugglers, who alone carried on the trade of the island, which consisted entirely of contraband goods. Since the suppression of this trade the inhabitants have betaken themselves to agriculture and fishing, herrings being found on this part of the coast in the greatest abundance. Upwards of 70 herring wherries belong to this port. On a small rocky island about 100 yards to the west of the town, and separated from it by the Peel river, which at low water is scarcely one foot deep, stands the old castle of Peel. The walls—flanked with towers built of clay-slate, in many places quoined and faced with red sandstone—enclose a polygonal area of about five acres, which is filled with the ruins of walls, dwelling-houses, churches, &c. Within this area stand the ruins of the cathedral church of St German, which is used now only as a burying place. Beneath the eastern part of it is the ecclesiastical prison, a horrid vault 18 feet deep, of which the groined roof is supported on low dwarf pillars. "This is certainly," says an old account of the place, "one of the most dreadful places that imagination can form. The sea runs under it through the hollows of the rock with such a continual roar that you would think it were every moment breaking in upon you, and over it are the vaults for burying the dead. The stairs (steps) descending to this place of terrors are not above thirty, but so steep and narrow that they are very difficult to go down, a child of eight or nine years old not being able to pass them but sideways." Other three churches stood within this area, all of them provided with similarly horrid cells, used as the instruments of spiritual oppression, and the means of intellectual debasement. In the rocks along the coast here are many curious caverns, and agates and cornelians are found on the sands. The town has fairs for horses and cattle March 8th and July 24th. The deemster holds his court here occasionally, and the high-bailiff holds one every Saturday. His jurisdiction extends over the parishes of Kirk-St-German, Kirk-Ballaugh, Kirk-Michael, and Kirk-Patrick. There is here a free grammar school endowed with the interest of £500 per annum, and a mathematical school endowed, besides some smaller donations, with £90 per annum. There are also other charitable bequests, which, for brevity's sake, we must pass over. Pop., in 1821, 1909.

Ramsey.—Ramsey is situated near the north-east corner of the island, on the Sulby or the Ramsey river, the largest in the island, and here crossed by a stone bridge of three arches. The town is irregularly built, but the streets are wide, well-paved, and clean. The surrounding country is highly picturesque, well cultivated, and adorned with numerous mansions, the residences of respectable native families. The stone and turf fences on many estates here have given place to quickset hedges, and there are several orchards of apple-trees in a flourishing condition. The Liverpool and Glasgow steam-packets call here through the summer twice a week. The market is on Saturday, principally for provisions, which are lower in price here than at any other place in the island. The Deemster holds his court here occasionally, and the high-bailiff holds one every Saturday. His jurisdiction extends over the parishes of Kirk-Andreas, Kirk-Bride, Kirk-Jurby, Kirk-Christ-Lezayre, and Kirk-Maughold. This last is the parish church, situated about three miles distant from the town, but there has been erected lately in the market-place, for the use of the townsmen, a chapel dedicated to St Paul. Here are besides, places of worship for the Seceders, and Primitive and Wesleyan Methodists. There are here two schools, one a grammar and the other a parochial school, both of them possessing considerable endowments. Pop., in 1821, 1523.

History.—The lordship of this little island seems to have been subject to many changes. At a pretty early period it seems to have fallen under the dominion of the Scots, and after that under the king of Northumberland. Subsequently it fell under the Danes—became tributary to England—was seized upon by the Norwegians, and by them delivered up to Alexander, king of Scotland, who having subdued the island annexed it to his dominions, and in place of its ancient armorial ensign, which was a ship in full sail, substituted the device of three legs, which it still retains. In 1289, along with the other possessions of the crown of Scotland, it was by the Scottish commissioners delivered up to Edward I. of England, who the following year restored it to John Baliol, to be held by him like all the other parts of the dominion of the crown of England. His successor, Edward II., having seized upon it, in one year bestowed it successively upon three of his favourites. In the reign of Edward III., a female descendant of Mary, daughter of Reginald, the last king of Man in the Norman line, having revived the claims of her family to the sovereignty of the island, and claimed the protection of that monarch, he sustained the validity of her title and gave her in marriage to Sir William de Montacute, who, assisted by his powerful patron, expelled the Scots, and was received with great joy by the natives as the legitimate representative of their right line of kings. In prosecuting his claim, however, Sir William had so far outrun his means, that he was under the necessity of mortgaging the island for seven years to Anthony Beck, bishop of Durham, who obtained from Richard II. a grant of it for life. On the death of the bishop it reverted to the natural heir, William de Montacute, earl of Salisbury, who in 1395 sold it to Sir William Scroop, afterward earl of Wiltshire, who being beheaded on the fall of Richard, it was by Henry IV. given to Henry Percy, earl of Northumberland. He too having forfeited it by rebellion, it was, 1406, granted to Sir John Stanley, whose descendant was in 1486, by Henry VII., created earl of Derby, to be held with all its royalties, regalities, and franchises, by liege homage, and presenting to every king of England at his coronation a cast of falcons. In this line its royalties and revenues remained till James, seventh earl of Derby, was deprived of his kingdom, his estates, and his life, at Derby-le-Moors, 1651, after which it was granted by parliament to the Lord Fairfax. It was at the restoration restored to the Derby family, in which it remained till 1735, when James, earl of Derby, dying without issue, it descended to James Murray, second duke of Athol, who was descended from Amelia Sophia, youngest daughter of James, seventh earl of Derby. From the increased rate of taxation in the British empire, and the vast number of articles which it included, Man, from its being beyond their operation, and from its locality, became a great depot of all kinds of taxed merchandise, whence they were smuggled into all the three kingdoms in such quantities as to affect materially the revenue. In consequence of this state of things, proposals were made to the Athol family by government for purchasing the superiority of the kingdom of Man, as soon as it was ascertained to be theirs; but the royalties, regalities, franchises, and revenues, having become of more value from the very circumstances which induced the government to purchase them, the proposal was coldly listened to, till at length the island being, by renewed and redoubled revenue acts, placed almost in a state of blockade, the duke of Athol and his dutchess, 1765, agreed to alienate the sovereignty of the island for £72,000, which was accordingly paid. The manorial rights, the patronage of the see, with sundry emoluments and perquisites being reserved, a misunderstanding arose in the settlement, and the duke and dutchess refused to surrender till they obtained a farther sum of £2,000, which was accordingly settled upon them for their lives. The sovereignty was now transferred to the crown, and the contraband trade was soon pretty effectually checked. The ex-monarchs, however, were not yet satisfied, and their son and successor, the late John, duke of Athol, continued to press the parliament with petitions on the ground of inadequate compensation, till, in 1805, an act was passed assigning to him and his heirs one-fourth of the gross revenues of the island. This being found vexatiously troublesome, an act was passed, 1825, authorizing the lords of the treasury to purchase from the duke his whole remaining interest in the royalty of the island, including revenues, manorial rights, patronage of the sea, &c. The duke having agreed to sell the whole, the valuation was left to arbiters mutually appointed, who awarded the sum of £416,000 as the value of the duke's reserved right, and the Isle of Man, with all its privileges and immunities, for ever ceded to the British government.

Government.—Amidst these transferences of the supreme power, the government of the island probably has continued to be nearly the same, exhibiting only those anomalies that arise from the spirit and character of the principal administrator, from the influence of which, the most refined and most philosophical systems cannot be altogether protected, but which, in a system of such primeval simplicity as that of Man, may be said to be nearly its all in all. The government is vested in a governor, lieutenant-governor, a council of 10 principal officers, and the house of keys. The governor, appointed, as all other civil and military officers are, by the crown, is chancellor ex officio; and his consent, or, in his absence, that of his lieutenant, is necessary to the passing of every law. The council consists of the bishop of the diocese, the attorney-general, the receiver-general, the two deemsters, or chief justices of the island, the clerk of the rolls, the water-bailiff, or judge-admiral, the archdeacon, and the two vicars-general, who are members ex officio. Without the sanction of a majority of this council, no law can be presented for the royal approbation. The house of keys, consisting of 24 principal landed proprietors, who are reckoned representatives of the people, possesses powers legislative and judicial. They are in all cases the interpreters of the common law, whence, it is conjectured, they have the name keys, to whom lies an appeal from the inferior law, and from whose decision there lies no appeal but to the king in council. When acting separately, 13 members must be present to give validity to their procedure. When a vacancy takes place, which can happen only in consequence of the death, the resignation, or the promoting of a member to an office which entitles him to a seat in the council, it is filled up by the body themselves, who, by plurality of votes, nominate two persons of suitable years and the necessary adjunct of property, whom they present to the governor, who takes which pleases him best, and that one is a key for life. They elect their own speaker, who, approved by the governor, also takes his seat for life. The governor may assemble the house when he pleases, and he may accept or reject offers of resignation as he sees meet. The three estates, the governor, the council, and the keys, may enact, abolish, or revive all insular laws, but they must be confirmed by the king, proclaimed in the Manks and English language from the Tynwald-hill to the whole people of the island if they choose to be present, and there signed by the governor, or in his absence by his lieutenant, by the council, and by the house of keys. The site of this ceremony is an artificial mount, evidently thrown up for the purpose, about three miles from the town of Peel. Its height is about 18 feet, having terraces all around it, the summit being reached by a flight of steps cut in the turf upon the west side. On the day of the court, the governor, or his deputy, is seated on a chair on the summit of the mount, placed under a canopy, while the deemsters, and other members of the council, with the house of keys, occupy in order the terraces beneath him, the surrounding area being occupied by the people. A court of this sort is held annually in the month of July, when various officers are chosen for the succeeding year. Besides the deemsters courts and those of the high bailiffs, the former for matters of the highest importance, the latter embracing actions for the smallest sums, there is a court of chancery, a court of common law, a court of general gaol delivery twice in the year, a court of admiralty, and the ecclesiastical courts. Manksmen alone are allowed to practise as agents in the law courts. No native can be arrested for debt except he is about to leave the island, and has obtained the governor's pass to that effect, in which case he may not only be arrested, but his effects may be taken possession of by the constable till he give security for his personal appearance. Distillation is prohibited in the island. Exciseable articles can only be imported by special license, and these licenses are restricted to the port of Douglas. The public roads are kept in repair by a tax on retailers of ale and spirituous liquors, on land, horses and dogs, and by certain fines which are appropriated to that purpose. The gross revenue, in 1829, was £21,143 8s. 7½d. Pop., in 1821, 40,061.

MANACCAN, a parish in the E. division of the hundred of Kerrier, co. of Cornwall. Living, a discharged vicarage in the archd. of Cornwall and dio. of Exeter, rated at £4 16s. 0½d. Church ded. to St Menaeus and St Dunstan. Patron, the bishop of Exeter. The small port of Helford is in this parish, and at Tregonnel are the ruins of a chapel. The newly discovered mineral substance, stannum, is found here. Distance from Falmouth, 6½ m. S.S.W. Pop., in 1801, 489; in 1831, 654. A. P., £2,711.

MANACHLOGDDU, a parish in the hundred of Cemaes, co. of Pembroke, South Wales. Living, a curacy, not in charge, in the archd. and dio. of St David's, rated at £5, returned at £139 11s. 11d. Patron, Lord Milford. Pop., in 1801, 352; in 1831, 447. A. P., £895.

MANAFON, a parish in the hundred of Newton, co. of Montgomery, North Wales. Living, a rectory in the archd. and dio. of St Asaph, rated at £8 18s. 4d. Patron, the bishop of St Asaph. There is here a small bequest for the education of the poor. Distance from Llanfair, 3 m. S. Pop., in 1801, 326; in 1831, 775. A. P., £2,934.

MANATON, a parish in the hundred of Teignbridge, co. of Devon. Living, a rectory in the archd. of Totness and dio. of Exeter, rated at £13 12s. 8½d. Church ded. to St Winifred. Patron, in 1829, the Rev. W. Carwithen. There is in this parish a curious inclosure of loose stones, containing about three acres of land, which has puzzled antiquarians not a little, some supposing it to be a work of the Druids, others, that it is only an old stannary court. Distance from Chedley, $8\frac{1}{2}$ m. W.N.W. Pop., in 1801, 348; in 1831, 435. A. P., £1,657.

MANBY, a parish in the Marsh division of the hundred of Louth-Eake, parts of Lindsey, co. of Lincoln. Living, a discharged rectory in the archd. and dio. of Lincoln, rated at £11 10s. 2d. Church ded. to St Mary. Patron, in 1829, Mrs Wray. Here is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. Distance from Louth, $5\frac{1}{2}$ m. E.S.E. Pop., in 1801, 144; in 1831, 207. A. P., £1,719.

MANBY, a hamlet in the parish of Broughton, co. of Lincoln. Distance from Glanford-bridge, 5 m. W.N.W. Returns included in those of the parish.

MANCETTER, a parish in Atherstone division of the hundred of Hemlingford, co. of Warwick. Living, a vicarage in the archd. of Coventry and dio. of Lichfield and Coventry, rated at £10 19s. 4d. The church—occupying an eminence supposed to have been a Roman camp—is dedicated to St Peter. Patron, the Rev. Benjamin Richings. The river Anker and the Coventry canal pass both through this parish. Here are stone quarries said to be the most extensive in the kingdom, with some very productive mines of manganese of superior quality. In the village of Mancetter is an hospital, endowed with a bequest of £2000 by James Gramer in 1724, for six poor men, each of whom receive six shillings per week. There are in the parish three endowed schools. Distance from London, 105 m. N.N.W. Pop., in 1801, including the market-town of Atherstone, with the hamlets of Hartshill and Oldbury, 3845; in 1831, 5200. A. P., £14,878.

MANCHESTER,

A noble commercial, and manufacturing town and parish, in the hundred of Salford, co.-palatine of Lancaster. The parish of Manchester is 11 miles long from N. to S., and 10 in breadth from E. to W. Its superficial extent is 34,507 acres. The S. and S.W. parts of the parish are chiefly inhabited by agriculturists and gentry; the N. by calico-printers, dyers, and spinners; the N.E. by silk and cotton weavers; and the E. and S.E. by batters, power-loom weavers, and coal miners. The town of Manchester occupies the N.W. side of the parish, and may be said to consist of two towns, viz. Manchester and Salford, to which the subordinate townships of Ardwick, Bradford, Beswick, Broughton, Cheetham, Chorlton-upon-Medlock, Hulme, Newton, Harpurhey, and Pendleton, are adjoining seigniors.

Ecclesiastical Affairs.—The principal, and, for a considerable period of time, the only church to this now overgrown parish, was founded and endowed as a collegiate institution to the honour of the blessed Virgin Mary, St George, and St Denis, by Thomas de la Ware, clerk and curate of the parish, in consequence of his having succeeded to the honours and the estates of his family, by the death of his brother, John, Lord de la Ware, in the 9th of Henry V. It was rebuilt in the reign of Henry VII., and still remains a noble specimen of the decorated style of Gothic architecture. It was suppressed at the general dissolution, when its revenues amounted to £226 12s. 5d., but re-established under Queen Elizabeth, under the designation of the warden and fellows of Christ's college, Manchester. Charles I., in 1636, granted them a new charter, with rules of government drawn up by Archbishop Laud. By this charter the management is vested in a warden, to be appointed by the crown, who must be a bachelor in divinity, or of canon and civil laws, and in four fellows, who must be masters of arts, or bachelors of laws. It also provides for the appointment of a sub-warden, treasurer, collector, registrar, a master of the choir, organist, four singing men, either clerks or laymen, and four boys skilled in music, to be chosen by the warden and fellows; and ordains that there shall be continually in the college two chaplains, or vicars, of the degree of bachelors of arts, and two clerks to administer the sacraments, visit the sick, and perform other religious offices. During the commonwealth it was dissolved by an act of parliament, but was revived at the restoration under the above-mentioned charter.—Trinity church, at Salford, was founded and endowed in 1635, by Humphrey Booth, Esq. It has been rebuilt in the Grecian style of architecture, in the Doric order. It is a curacy. Patron, of late, Sir Robert Gore Booth, Bart.—St Ann's, St Ann's-square, was founded in 1709, under the auspices of Lady Ann Bland. It is a spacious structure, in the Grecian style of architecture, in the Corinthian order. Living, a rectory, not in charge. Patron, the bishop of Chester.—St Mary's, between Dean's-gate and the Irwell, erected in 1756 by the warden and fellows of Christ's college, Manchester, under the authority of an act of parliament, is a handsome structure also in the Grecian style, and in the Doric order, with a lofty tower and spire 186 feet in height. Living, a rectory not in charge. Patrons, the wardens and fellows of Christ's college, Manchester.—St Paul's, a neat brick building, was erected in 1765. Living, a curacy. Patrons, the warden and fellows of the college.—St John's, Byrom-street, built in 1769 by Edward Byrom, Esq., under the authority of an act of parliament, is in the decorated Gothic style, with beautifully stained windows, one of them brought from a convent in Rouen. It has vaults underneath, and is the property of the heirs of the founder. Living, a rectory, not in charge. Patrons—after two presentations—the warden and fellows of the college.—St James's, a spacious brick building, erected in 1787 by the Rev. Cornelius Bayley, D.D., is a curacy. Patron, the founder, with reversion to the warden and fellows of the college at the end of 60 years from its consecration.—St Michael's, also a brick building, founded in 1789 by the late Rev. Humphrey Owen, is a curacy. Patron, the heir of the founder, with reversion at the end of 60 years the same as the preceding.—St Mark's, founded by the late Rev. E. Ethelston, and, in 1794, finished by his son, is a curacy. Patronage with the heirs of the founder, with reversion at the end of 60 years, the same as the two preceding.—St Peter's, erected by subscription, and consecrated in 1794, is in the Grecian style of architecture, having a stately tower and a noble portico of the Doric order. The altar-piece is embellished with the descent from the cross, by Annibal Caracci. Living, a curacy. Patronage with the trustees, with reversion after 60 years, the same as the three preceding.—St Stephen's, Salford, a neat brick building ornamented with stone, was founded in 1794 by the Rev. N. M. Cheek. Living, a curacy. Patronage the same as the four preceding.—St George's, a large brick building, opened for divine service in 1798, consecrated in 1818, when it was purchased by subscription. Living, a curacy. Patron, the bishop of Chester.—All Saints, in the centre of Grosvenor-square, an elegant structure in the Grecian style of architecture, was built at an expense of £14,000, by the Rev. Charles Burton, LL. B. Living, a curacy. Patronage in the hands of the founder, with reversion to the warden and fellows of Christ's college, Manchester.—St Matthew's, Castlefield, an elegant structure in the decorated Gothic style, was built in 1823 by grant from the parliamentary commissioners of £11,917. Living, a curacy. Patrons, the wardens and fellows of Christ college, Manchester.—St Philip's, Salford, in the Grecian style of architecture, with a tower and portico in the Ionic order, was erected in 1825 by grant from the parliamentary commissioners of £13,423 5s. Living, a curacy. Patrons, the warden and fellows of Christ college, Manchester.—St George's, Hulme, a beautiful structure in the decorated Gothic style, was erected in 1828 by grant from the parliamentary commissioners of £14,416 19s. 5d.—Of still more recent erection is that of St Andrew, Travis-street, erected by grant from the parliamentary commissioners of £9,900.—The chapel of St Thomas, at Ardwick, a neat brick building, was consecrated in 1741. Living, a curacy, in the patronage of the warden and fellows of the college.—St Clement's, Lever-street, erected in 1793, and St Luke's, Bedford-street, erected 1804, are open for divine service, according to the liturgy of the church of England, but have not been consecrated. Besides the above, there are here six Baptist meeting-houses, one for the Society of Friends, five for Independents, one for Welsh Independents, and one for Independent Methodists, two for Methodists of the New Connexion, one for Primitive, one for Tent, 11 for Wesleyan, and two for Welsh Methodists, two for Presbyterians, two for Swedenborgians, three for Unitarians, four for Roman Catholics, and a synagogue of Jews. Of these meeting-houses, some are built in a most expensive style, and are highly decorated, particularly that of St Augustine, belonging to the Catholics, which cost upwards of £10,000, and has school rooms under it capable of accommodating 1200 children. That belonging to the Friends has a much admired Ionic portico, copied from that of the temple of Ceres on the Ilyssus, the expense of the whole building being upwards of £12,000. The parish is comprised in 10 chapels and 20 townships.

History.—The parish of Manchester was a wild unfrequented woodland, according to Whitaker, 500 B. C. Agricola, the Roman general, conquered Manchester, A. D. 76, when four minor forts were erected in the Roman Mancunium. A regular town is supposed to have been planned and formed here in the years 80, 81, and 82. Manchester was styled a city, and named Mancenion, by the Saxons, about A. D. 921; and Salford is described as a Saxon manor and royal possession, giving name to the hundred in A. D. 931. Randolph de Blundeville, earl of Chester, on behalf of the king, granted a charter, making Salford a free or corporate borough in 1230. Thomas de Gresley, the sixth baron, took a survey of his manor of Manchester in 1294, and granted a liberal charter to his townsmen in 1301. William West, the eleventh baron, having differed with the burgesses in 1579, sold the manor on the 15th of May, 1579, to John Lacye, of London, cloth-worker, for £3000; on the 23d of March, 1596, the manor was re-sold by Lacye to Sir Nicholas Mosley, knight, of Hough End Hall, in Withington, for £3500! The manor has ever since this period been in the Mosley family, the present lord being Sir Oswald Mosley, Bart., M. P., of Rolleston, Staffordshire. In 1808 an attempt was made on the part of the town to purchase the manor, but it failed, owing to a difference in the price, £70,000 being the sum offered, and £90,000 the sum asked. Manchester took part in the dispute betwixt Charles and his parliament in 1642. At first Sir Cecil Trafford supplied the inhabitants with arms for the use of the king, but after petitioning his majesty to restore peace, they took the side of the parliament, and got the county militia to garrison the town. Preparations being made for a general siege, it commenced on the 25th of September, 1642, and terminated on the 30th of September, with considerable loss to the royalists, who retreated under the command of the earl of Derby. Sir Thomas Fairfax, the parliamentary general, stationed himself here on the 12th of January, 1643. Manchester returned a member to parliament, by order of Cromwell, in 1654; a second member was returned in 1655, but the town lost its franchise by the restoration. The Scottish rebels, under the command of the Pretender, entered Manchester, and were joined by 300 men on the 25th of November, 1745; they quitted Manchester on the 3d of December, but re-entered it on their retreat to the north on the 8th, and finally left the town the following day, after levying a contribution of £5000 on the inhabitants. From this period the most interesting facts in the history of Manchester are connected with the rise and progress of its cotton manufactures. On the 18th of January, 1819, a great radical meeting took place here in St Peter's Field. Another meeting took place in the same field on the 16th of August, 1819, which was attended by 60,000 people, who were dispersed by the yeomany cavalry corps.—Mr Hunt and several of the speakers were taken to prison, and 8 persons killed and 600 wounded by the yeomanry. Since this event, the most remarkable incident in the history of Manchester was the opening of the great railway, to be afterwards noticed.

General Description.—Manchester is situated on the S.E. bank of the Irwell, where that river is joined by the Irk and the Medlock, over the former of which it has seven bridges, six of them low, and apt to be flooded when the rains are heavy, the seventh a lofty structure of three arches, connecting a new line of road from the extremity of Miller-street with what was at one time called Strangeways-park, and forming a splendid entrance into the town; over the latter it has nine in various parts of the town. Salford stands on the N.W. bank of the Irwell, connected by 7 bridges with Manchester, of which it forms an integral part. Of these bridges the most ancient, which had existed from time immemorial, was rebuilt in the reign of Edward III. Over the Shooter's-brook there are a number of smaller bridges, and over the numerous branches of canals that intersect the town, not less than 30. It is about two miles in length, and a mile and a half in breadth, and has upwards of 600 streets, which are paved and lighted with gas, under the direction of 240 commissioners, who form a body corporate, having a common seal. The inhabitants are supplied with water by the Manchester and Salford water company, established by act of parliament in 1809. The older parts of the town are crowded, the houses mean, and the streets narrow. Great improvements, however, of late years have been made even in these places, and the more modern streets are spacious, airy, and well-built. At the same time it is evident, that elegance of plan and symmetry of parts are far less the objects of attention than convenience for carrying on an extended commerce, and the accommodations necessary for extending manufactures. Warehouses of immense extent, cotton mills, and weaving factories, &c. &c., have consequently been set down in those places of the town that were formerly occupied by the best and most agreeable dwelling houses, and in all directions it is crowded with numerous cottages for the families of those who are employed in the various public works. The environs are in many parts pleasingly diversified, and in the immediate neighbourhood are different ranges of fine building, with numerous villas, displaying both wealth and elegance in a high degree. Among these we may specify Ardwick-green and Salford-crescent, the former having a fine sheet of water in the centre, surrounded with highly respectable mansions, the latter commanding a beautiful view of the Irwell, with the fertile vales on its opposite, sheltered by gently rising hills. Below this, on the bank of the same river, are several tiers of fine houses, rising successively above one another, from the margin of the stream, with the most pleasing effect. What is called Gibb-saltar on the Irk, likewise presents a cluster of cottages of the most pleasing and picturesque character.

Public Buildings.—The public buildings appropriated to the purposes of commerce, the administration of the laws, the diffusion of science, and the encouragement of the arts, are numerous, and, in general, adapted to the purposes for which they were erected, though, perhaps, a stranger may think them in some instances scarcely equal to what might have been expected from such a wealthy and extensively trading and manufacturing community. The town-hall is a noble edifice, erected at an expense of £40,000, after a design copied from the temple of Erectheus at Athens, having a beautiful tower and dome in the centre, in imitation of the tower of Andronicus, called the temple of the winds. The principal entry is by a magnificent colonnade with a rich entablature, in front of which are beautifully sculptured various representations of the town of Manchester, with emblems of trade and commerce. Besides apartments for transacting the public business of the town, the building contains on the principal floor a splendid public room 192 feet long, 43 feet 8 inches broad, and 51½ feet in height, to the centre of the principal dome. Two ranges of beautiful Ionic columns divide this capacious apartment into three parts, and they are so disposed, that each part may be made a separate room at pleasure.—The town-hall of Salford, Chapel-street, is also a handsome structure, having a noble portico in the Doric style, copied after that of the temple of Theseus, supporting a triangular pediment. In the under part it affords an area for the use of the markets, in the upper a large court-room, an elegant suit of assembly-rooms, &c. It was erected at an expense of £10,000.—Chorlton-row town-hall, dispensary, and constable's dwelling-house, connected in one building, forms an edifice of a highly imposing appearance. It was erected at an expense of £4,500.—The New Bailey, or house of correction, Stanley-street, Salford, has accommodation for 926 prisoners, and is seldom occupied by fewer than 500. The discipline observed in this prison seems to be excellent, calculated to reclaim the guilty, and to afford them the means of subsisting themselves after they are discharged, a most material circumstance, which in almost every coercive system has been totally overlooked. Those who have learned any trade, are, during their confinement, kept regularly to it, receiving at their dismissal a large share of what they have earned, and those who have learned none, are taught one by which they may afterwards in the exercise of industry lead honest lives.—The Manchester exchange, though demanding little notice as a piece of architecture, is most conveniently fitted up as a place of resort for merchants, manufacturers, and men of business.—The Portico, which contains a library, a reading-room, a committee-room, &c. &c., erected in 1806 by subscription, at an expense of £7000, is a handsome edifice, built of Run-corn stone, in the Ionic order.—The Royal Institution, from a design by Mr Barry of London, forms a splendid addition to the architectural ornaments of the town. The principal elevation, fronting Mosley-street, has a noble portico of six lofty Ionic columns, supporting a rich entablature and pediment in the centre, on each side of which are columns and pilasters connecting it with the wings. Above the doors and windows are bas-reliefs, symbolical of the design of the institution. The centre of the building comprises the hall and the theatre—the one wing is appropriated as an academy of the fine arts with exhibition-rooms—the other as a museum of natural history. The cost of the whole is calculated at £50,000.—In Hulme township are horse-barracks, capable of accommodating a squadron of dragoons; and the foot-barracks, Regent's-road, Salford, are calculated for the reception of 1000 men.—In York-buildings, and Chapel-street, Salford, are the cloth-halls, or public-marts, for the sale of Yorkshire cloth; and in Hanging-ditch is the corn-exchange, neither of them entitled to particular description. A neat theatre has been lately erected at an expense of £15,000, which is occasionally occupied by respectable performers. Concerts are performed regularly at set times through the season.

Markets.—The public markets are numerous, and the market days are Tuesday, (principally appropriated to the sale of merchandise brought in carts and waggons from the different factories,) Wednesday, Thursday, and Saturday. The principal market-places are the New Shambles at the end of Bridge-street, for butcher meat; Long-millgate and Shude-hill for fruit; Smithfield-market, Shude-hill, for variety of provisions, except on Wednesdays, when it is appropriated to the sale of cattle. In the London-road are markets for butcher-meat, fruit, and vegetables; there is also a market in Brown-street. In Smithy-door are the poultry, egg, and butter markets, chiefly on Saturdays. The fish market, which is at all times abundantly supplied, is in the Old Market-place. Salford has a general market-place beneath the Town-hall. Races have been run annually here in Whitsun-week for upwards of a century, on a course prepared on Kersal-moor; and there are fairs on Whitsun-Monday, Easter-Monday, October 1st, and November 17th, and one for cattle every alternate Wednesday.

Government.—Having no corporation nor any separate jurisdiction, the town is governed by a boroughreeve and two constables, courts leet and baron being held under the authority of the lord of the manor. Courts leet take place at Easter and at Michaelmas. The boroughreeve and other officers are appointed annually at the latter. A court leet is held every third week for the recovery of small debts, and a court of requests for the whole parish of Manchester holds its session every Wednesday for the same purpose. Salford is governed by a boroughreeve and 120 burgesses, who were incorporated on the 18th of March, 1830. Chorlton is also governed by a popularly chosen body of police. A court is also held at Salford every third Thursday under the authority of the earl of Selson as steward of the hundred, and the county court holds here a session once a month. By the new reform act Manchester is a borough, and sends two members to parliament. The several townships of Chorlton-Row, Ardwick, Beswick, Hulme, Cheetham, Bradford, Newton, and Harper-Hey, are included within the boundaries of the new borough. The total number of electors is about 12,700. The boroughreeve for the time being is the returning officer. Salford returns one representative independent of Manchester. For the administration of criminal justice a stipendiary magistrate is appointed by government, with a salary of £1,000 per year. He is always a barrister, and sits daily, Sabbath excepted, in the court room of the New-Bailey for the despatch of business, being usually assisted by some of the county magistrates. The quarter sessions are held before a barrister, who is in the commission of the peace, and acts as chairman of the bench of justices. He has a salary of £800 per annum. The police commissioners of Manchester expend about £24,000 annually in their department.

Literary and Scientific Institutions.—Among institutions for promoting literature and science those of Manchester hold a distinguished place. The literary and philosophical society, founded here 1781, was one of the earliest provincial associations of the kind formed in the kingdom, and has given to the world its transactions in a number of highly valued volumes. It consists of ordinary, honorary, and corresponding members; £2 2s. is paid on admission, and £1 1s. per annum is required to continue the membership. The agricultural society, also one of the oldest in the kingdom, was instituted 1767. It embraces a distance of 30 miles round Manchester, and gives annual premiums for useful discoveries, for superior specimens in the vegetable and animal kingdoms, to cottagers, who, by their own industry, bring up families independent of parochial assistance, and to farm servants who have continued for the greatest length of time in one situation and with unblemished reputation. Here are besides, the Philological society, instituted 1803, consisting of 30 resident and 50 corresponding members; the society for promoting the study of natural history, to which belongs a valuable museum; the Floral and Horticultural society; and the Royal Manchester institution, chiefly for the encouragement of the fine arts, under the direction of a president, 12 vice-presidents, and a committee chosen from a body of nearly 700 hereditary and life governors, of whom the former are contributors of forty and the latter of twenty-five guineas each.

Manufactures.—The distinguishing characteristics, however, of Manchester are its various and excellent manufactures, which are carried on to an almost incredible extent. So early as 1352 the town had acquired great celebrity from a kind of woollen cloth which went by the name of Manchester cottons. In the reign of Charles I., considerable progress had been made here in the linen and cotton trade. In the 'Treasure of Traffic,' a work upon trade and manufactures, published 1641, linen yarn is stated to have been at that time purchased by the manufacturers of Manchester from Ireland, and cotton wool from London, the goods made from which were returned to the same places for sale. A hundred years later the manufacturers had agents employed in different parts of the country to procure supplies of raw cotton, which was spun upon the spindle and distaff in the cottages of the workmen, and woven up into fastians, tickets, dimities, and jeans, to which were subsequently added cotton velvets, velveteens, and strong fancy cords. These goods, which were of the most excellent quality, and for some time intended only for home consumption, soon found their way into the markets of continental Europe and America, where the demand was such as, from the want of yarn especially, the merchants and manufacturers found it impossible to supply. In consequence of the great demand for cloth, a Mr John Kay here invented the fly-shuttle, by the aid of which the weaver was at once enabled to double the quantity of cloth in length, and at the same time in breadth if he chose so to do. The same Mr Kay, in conjunction with Mr Thomas Highs, shortly after invented the spinning-jenny, the powers of which were greatly increased by the improvements of Mr Hargreaves, whose success having alarmed the liberal and enlightened working classes, they destroyed his machinery, and compelled him to retreat to Nottingham, where he is said to have died in great indigence. The spirit of improvement is sometimes easily damped, but at this period proved irrepressible. Machines of greater power were constructed by Arkwright, Crompton, Watt, &c., by which the quantity of goods manufactured was increased thirty-fold. In 1781 the quantity of cotton wool imported was 5,198,778 pounds, in 1800 it was 56,010,732 pounds; in 1828 it amounted to 237,760,642 pounds. In 1817 the value of cotton goods exported from Manchester was £17,655,378, in 1830, £37,269,396. Not less than four-fifths of the entire cotton trade of the kingdom is supposed to centre in Lancashire, and the capital sunk in buildings and machinery exclusively appropriated to the manufacture of cotton, is calculated at upwards of eight millions sterling. In 1825 there were in the parish of Manchester upwards of 20,000 steam looms at work, and since that period they have been considerably increased. In the town and its immediate vicinity there are not less than 114 factories, worked by 114 steam engines of the aggregate power of 3981 horses. These factories, in several of which the whole process, from the raw material to the finished piece of cloth, is carried on, are immense ranges of building from six to eight stories in height, employing from 1800 to 2000 persons each. In the different factories of this description the number of hands employed cannot be less than 30,000. Nor are the manufactures of this town confined to those of cotton. The woollen, linen, and silk manufactures, the latter especially, are carried on to a great extent, and are in a very thriving condition. Subsidiary to these staple manufactures, there are many extensive and profitable branches of industry carried on here, such as bleaching, calico-printing, glazing, engraving, engine and machine making, dyeing, with the preparation of the various liquors, oils, and acids, required in the different processes of bleaching, printing, and dyeing, to which the goods must be subjected before they are ready for the market. Hat making, paper making, pin making, rope and twine making, brass founding, iron founding, brewing, &c. are all carried on to a very large extent. For the purchase of these multifarious manufactures agents are here established for foreign merchants from almost all countries, who select upon the spot each the articles suitable for his purposes, from the manufactures of the district which are centred here in one common depot. By the Mersey and Irwell navigation, Manchester has long enjoyed an easy communication with the port of Liverpool, whence its manufactures have been exported to every quarter of the globe.

Railway.—This facility of communication has been greatly augmented by the completion of an iron railway, adapted to the use of steam carriages, for the conveyance of goods and passengers, at a rate of speed that but a few years ago would have been thought too much for the pages of a romance. This splendid undertaking was completed in 1830, at an expense of upwards of £800,000, subscribed in shares of £100 each. The first load of merchandise passed along this road, which is 31 miles in length, December 4th, 1830. It consisted of 200 barrels of flour, 63 sacks of oat-meal, 34 sacks of malt, and 135 bags of cotton, stowed in 18 waggons, dragged by the Planet locomotive engine, the total weight being 86 tons, and the time occupied in the journey 2 hours and 54 minutes, including three stoppages of 5 minutes each. A scheme for connecting Manchester with Sheffield, by means of a railway, was abandoned in April, 1832. It is proposed to form railways to Leeds and several other places. By the numerous canals connected with the Irwell and Mersey an easy communication is kept up with Bristol and London, as well as with all the intermediate places of importance.

Schools.—For the purposes of education there are here—the free grammar school, founded in the reign of Henry VIII. by Hugh Oldham, bishop of Exeter, and by him endowed with houses, tenements, corn mills, and lands, now producing upwards of £4,000 per annum.—The Blue-coat-hospital school, connected with the hospital of that name and with the Cheetham library, founded 1653, and endowed by Humphrey Cheetham, Esq. of Clayton-hall.—The ladies' Jubilee school, established to commemorate the fiftieth anniversary of the reign of George III.—Two national schools, one at Manchester and one in Salford.—The Lancasterian school, and the Sabbath schools belonging to the different congregations of the town, the scholars attending which are supposed to be about 30,000. The number of scholars attending the first of these schools is from 150 to 200, who receive the classical part of their education gratuitously, but pay for all the other parts of it. To this school belong twelve exhibitions to either of the universities, value £40 per annum each; and, in turn with the schools of Hereford and Marlborough, an interest in sixteen scholarships in Brazen-nose college, Oxford, with an equal number in St John's college, Cambridge, value from £18 to £26 each. The second, the Blue-coat school, was originally intended for 40 boys to be educated, clothed, and apprenticed. From the increase of the funds the number has been augmented to 80. The ladies' Jubilee school, supported by subscription under the management of a committee of ladies, maintains and educates 30 female orphans. To this school Miss Hall, one of the original projectors, in 1828 bequeathed £11,000. The two national schools, founded 1812, and supported by subscription, educate each 300 boys and an equal number of girls. The Lancasterian school, founded 1813, and supported by subscription, educates upwards of 1000 children of both sexes. To the above must be added the foundation of Mrs Ann Hinde for educating and clothing 28 children belonging to Manchester and 29 belonging to the township of Stretford. It was laid, 1723, by a bequest of lands, &c. now yielding £200 per annum. St Paul's charity school, erected 1777, for the instruction of poor children, has a dwelling house for the master, with a permanent income of £34 per annum. It has been for some time past suspended, whether wisely or not, we have not the means of deciding, for the avowed purpose of accumulation. Schools of medicine, surgery, and anatomy, were opened here in 1830.

Charitable Institutions.—Of charitable institutions there is here almost a superabundance. We can particularize only a very few. The Manchester royal infirmary, dispensary, lunatic hospital and asylum.—The fever hospital, Aytton-street.—The lying-in hospital, Stanley-street.—The lock hospital, Bond-street.—The female penitentiary, Rusholme-road.—The strangers' friend society.—The Samaritan society.—The church clothing society.—The Salford Dorcas society, &c. besides which there are for distribution in bread, clothes, money, and other necessities, at the disposal of the borough-reeve, bequests to the amount of £2,393 per annum.—Among eminent persons, natives of this parish, may be mentioned William Crabtree, the inventor of the micrometer, who was killed at the battle of Marston-Moor, 1644; John Byrom, the inventor of a well-known system of stenography, author of a still very popular song, and one of the original writers in the Spectator; John Ferriar, M.D. the illustrator of Sterne, &c. Thomas Faulkner, the traveller to whom the world is indebted for the first authentic account of Patagonia; and the Rev. John Whitaker, author of the history of Manchester.

Manchester is situated in 2° 42' W. long., and 53° 22' N. lat. Distance from London, 186 m. N.W.N. Pop., in 1801, returned under the 20 townships and 10 chapelries which compose the parish, 110,938, of this number 70,409 belonged to the township of Manchester; in 1831, the population of the entire parish was 270,961; of the township of Manchester, 142,026. MANNINGTON, a parish in the hundred of South Erpingham, co. of Norfolk. Living, a discharged rectory with that of Itteringham, in the archd. and dio. of Norwich, rated at £1 16s. 5½d. Distance from Aylesham, 4½ m. N.N.W. Pop., in 1801, 24; in 1831, 13. A. P., £398.

MANNINGTREE, a market-town and parish in the hundred of Tendring, co. of Essex. Living, a curacy to the rectory of Mistley, in the archd. of Colchester and dio. of London. Patron, the rector of Mistley. The town, which is very irregularly built, stands on the south bank of the Stour, on the great road leading to Harwich from London. The streets are partially paved, but not lighted. A considerable trade in malt is carried on here, and it imports corn, coals, and timber. The market-day is Thursday, for corn and cattle, and the Thursday in Whitsun-week is a fair for toys. Here are places of worship for the Baptists, the Independents, and the Wesleyan Methodists, and a school for both sexes on the national plan is supported by subscription. Distance from London, 61 m. N.E.E. Pop., in 1801, 1016; in 1831, 1237. A. P., £1718.

MANSERGH, a chapelry in the parish of Kirkby-Lonsdale, co. of Westmoreland. Living, a curacy in the archd. of Richmond and dio. of Chester, not in charge, returned at £116. The chapel, built 1726, at the expense of Jacob Dawson, is ded. to St Peter. Patron, the vicar of Kirkby-Lonsdale. This township is delightfully situated, and commands a fine view of the vale of Lune. Distance from Kirkby-Lonsdale, 3½ m. N.N.W. Pop., in 1801, 134; in 1831, 232. A. P., £2,811.

MANSFIELD, a market-town and parish, in the north of the wapentake of Broxtow, co. of Nottingham. Living, a vicarage in the archd. of Nottingham and dio. of York, rated at £7 7s. 6d. The church—a spacious Gothic structure—is ded. to St Peter. Patron, the dean of Lincoln. The very ancient town of Mansfield, which derives its name from the small river Maun, which has its source a little to the westward of it, is situated in the centre of the celebrated forest of Sherwood, on the great road from London to Leeds. It is neat, well-built, and lighted with gas. It has of late years been much improved by the enlargement of the market-place, and the removal of various encumbrances from the approaches to it. The principal buildings are the Moot-hall, erected 1752, by the countess of Oxford, and a neat, though small theatre. The former contains apartments for the transacting of public business, with an elegant assembly room. The town has an extensive trade in malt, and considerable manufactories of cotton, hosiery, and lace. It has also some iron founderies, and many architectural ornaments are cut from a fine free-stone quarry in the neighbourhood and sent to distant places. A double railway from the town to Pinxton on the Cromford canal, a distance of 7 miles, has been of vast advantage to its trade, and to the general comfort of the inhabitants, having reduced the price of coals nearly one-third. A charter was obtained from Henry III. for holding here a market on Monday, with a privilege which the townsmen still enjoy, of cutting timber for the repair of houses and wood for fences out of the forest. Sherwood forest is famous in ballad lore as the scene of the exploits of 'bold Robin Hood,' and we suppose there are few readers in the three kingdoms who have not some time in their lives enjoyed a hearty laugh with the 'Miller of Mansfield.' Besides the established church, there are here places of worship for general Baptists, the society of Friends, the Independents, the Methodists—Primitive and Wesleyan, and the Unitarians. There is a free grammar school with a good endowment, and a free school for the clothing and educating 36 poor boys. There are a number of charitable bequests by different individuals, which it would be tedious to particularise. Robert Doddsley, the author of the once singularly popular work, the Economy of Human Life, who, from a humble footman raised himself to great opulence and the highest respectability as a bookseller, was a native of this place. Distance from Nottingham, 14 m. N.N.W., and from London, 138 m. N.N.W. Pop., in 1801, 5988; in 1831, 9426. A. P., £13,926.

MANSFIELD-WOODHOUSE, a parish in the N. division of the wapentake of Broxtow, co. of Nottingham. Living, a curacy to the vicarage of Mansfield in the archd. of Nottingham and dio. of York, certified at £40 13s. 4d. Chapel ded. to St Edmund. Patron, in 1829, the duke of Portland. About 1300 acres in this parish, with a few in the neighbouring parish of Mansfield, are all that now remain uninclosed in the ancient forest of Sherwood. Remains of two Roman villæ have been discovered in this parish within the last half century, one of them containing a piece of elegant Mosaic pavement, measuring 20 yards by 14, in a state of fine preservation. There are here places of worship for the Independents and the Wesleyan Methodists, and two considerable endowments for the education of the poor. Distance from Mansfield, $1\frac{1}{2}$ m. N. Pop., in 1801, 1112; in 1831, 1859. A. P., £4,527.

MANSHEAD, a hundred in the co. of Bedford, at the S.W. extremity of the county, bordering on Buckinghamshire, comprises 23 parishes, including the town of Leighton-Buzzard, and, in 1831, contained a resident population of 21,124 souls.

MANSRIGGS, a township in the parish of Ulverstone, co.-palatine of Lancaster. Distance from Ulverstone, $1\frac{1}{2}$ m. N. Pop., in 1801, 64; in 1831, 69. A. P., £621.

MANSTON, a parish in the hundred of Redlane, Sherborne division of the co. of Dorset. Living, a rectory in the archd. of Dorset and dio. of Bristol, rated at £12 5s. Church ded. to St Nicholas. Patron, in 1829, Lord Bolingbroke. Distance from Shaftsbury, 6 m. S.W.S. Pop., in 1801, 109; in 1831, 149. A. P., £2,633.

MANTHORP WITH LITTLE GONERBY, a township in the co. of Lincoln. The township is now comprised within the boundaries of the borough of Grantham. Distance from Grantham, 1 m. N.N.E. Pop., in 1801, 446; in 1831, 1720. A. P., £4,527.

MANTHORPE, a hamlet in the parish of Witham-on-the-Hill, co. of Lincoln. Distance from Bourne, $3\frac{1}{2}$ m. S.W.S. Pop., in 1801, 95; in 1831, 100. A. P., £758.

MANTON, a parish in the east division of the wapentake of Manley, parts of Lindsey, co. of Lincoln. Living, a rectory in the archd. of Stow and dio. of Lincoln, rated at £13 6s. 8d., returned at £150. Church ded. to St Hilald. Patron, in 1829, W. Dalryson, Esq. Distance from Glandford-Bridge, $5\frac{1}{2}$ m. S.W.W. Pop., in 1801, 85; in 1831, 150. A. P., £2,815.

MANTON, a parish in the hundred of Martinsley, co. of Rutland. Living, a discharged vicarage in the archd. of Northampton and dio. of Peterborough, rated at £10, returned at £70. The church—a small edifice, having a peaked Gothic tower for two bells—is ded. to St Mary. Here was a chantry, founded the 25th of Edward III. by William Wade and John Wade, chaplains, for a master and two stipendiary brethren, whose revenues at the dissolution were valued at £26 18s. 8d. Distance from Uppingham, $3\frac{1}{2}$ m. N. by E. Pop., in 1801, 187; in 1831, 229. A. P., £2,124.

MANTON, a tything in the parish of Pershute, co. of Wilts. The returns are included in those of the parish.

MAPERTON, a parish in the hundred of Catsash, co. of Somerset. Living, a rectory in the archd. of Wells and dio. of Bath and Wells. Church ded. to St Peter and St Paul. Patrons, the warden and fellows of Wadham college, Oxford. Distance from Wincanton, $3\frac{1}{2}$ m. S.W. W. Pop., in 1801, including the hamlet of Clapton, 171; in 1831, 187. A. P., £2,066.

MAPLEBECK, a parish in the north division of the wapentake of Thurgarton, co. of Nottingham. Living, a curacy in the archd. of Nottingham and dio. of York, rated at £19 10s. Patron, the duke of Newcastle. Distance from Southwell, $5\frac{1}{2}$ m. N.E. Pop., in 1801, 151; in 1831, 181. A. P., £1,238.

MAPLEDERWELL, a parish in the hundred of Basingstoke, Basingstoke division of the co. of Southampton. Living, a curacy annexed to the rectory of Newnham in the archd. and dio. of Winchester. Church ded. to St Mary. Distance from Basingstoke, $3\frac{1}{2}$ m. E.S.E. Pop., in 1801, 160; in 1831, 211. A. P., £916.

MARAZION, a market town in the parish of St Hilary, hundred of Penwith, co. of Cornwall, situated on a declivity near the bottom of a hill, which affords it complete shelter from the north winds. Its more common name, Market-Jew, is said to have been derived from the circumstance of the Jews in ancient times resorting hither in great numbers to an annual market, where they sold off various commodities and in return made large purchases of tin. Its trade at present consists principally in importing timber, coals, and iron, for the use of the neighbouring mines. It is governed by a mayor, 8 aldermen, and 12 capital burgesses, with power to hold one weekly market—Thursday, and two annual fairs—Thursday three weeks before Easter-eve, and the 29th of September. Living, a curacy to the vicarage of St Hilary, in the archd. of Cornwall and dio. of Exeter. Church ded. to St Catherine. There are here also places of worship for the society of Friends, the Independents, and the Wesleyan Methodists, with a free school. Distance from London, 282 m. W.S.W. MARCLE (MUCH), a parish in the hundred of Greytree, co. of Hereford. Living, a vicarage united with the curacy of Kinnaston, in the archd. and dio. of Hereford, rated at £14 0s. 5d. Church ded. to St Bartholomew. Patron, in 1829, James Money, Esq. Distance from Ledbury, 5 m. S.W.W. Pop., in 1801, 779; in 1831, 1212. A. P., £8,668.

MARCLE (LITTLE), a parish in the hundred of Radlow, co. of Hereford. Living a discharged curacy in the archd. and dio. of Hereford, rated at £7 1s. 4d. The church is in ruins. Patron, the bishop of Hereford. A very remarkable phenomenon appeared in this parish on the 17th of February, 1575. Marcley-hill on the evening of that day began to move from its station "with a horrible roaring noise," and kept moving till Monday the 19th, carrying along with it trees, hedges, and cattle, and overthrowing in its progress the chapel of Kinnaston, when it rested in its present position, considerably more elevated than it was before. A chasm, forty feet deep, and about thirty long, remained where the hill originally stood. Distance from Ledbury, 3 m. W.S.W. Pop., in 1801, 128; in 1831, 143. A. P., £1,515.

MARCROSS, a parish in the hundred of Ogmere, co. of Glamorgan. Living, a rectory in the dio. of Llandaff, rated at £9 10s. 10d. M A R G A T E, of Kent. The livings are two; the first is a vicarage in the archd. and dio. of Canterbury, rated at £8. The church—anciently a chapel to the mother church at Minster, and situated on an eminence a little to the S.E. of the town—is ded. to St John. Patron, the archbishop of Canterbury. The second is a curacy to the vicarage of St John's. The church—a Gothic structure of great beauty, 143 feet in length and 71 in breadth, with a tower 180 feet in height, completed, in 1829, at an expense of £26,000—is ded. to the Holy Trinity. Patron, the vicar of St John's. The town is pleasantly situated on the declivities of two hills and along the valley below. The streets are in general well paved, clean, and lighted with gas. Originally it was a poor insignificant fishing village, called St John's, consisting of one scattered and irregular street, which now forms the High-street, or the Mergate, i. e. the gate to the sea, whence the name Margate. Possessing a fine sandy beach, the water of the bay being remarkable at all times for its transparency, and an atmosphere pure and salubrious, it has become, for half a century back, a principal bathing station. In consequence of this, the town has extended itself on all sides, and can now boast of many fine streets and squares of modern erection, while all the old ones have been subjected to numerous alterations and repairs. Joined, as it were, to London, by that ready conveyance which is insured by numerous steam-boats, the crowds that visit it during the summer season from the metropolis are immense. In some of the late seasons they have amounted to nearly 100,000. In supplying the wants and administering to the luxury of these ever-shifting crowds, the ingenuity of the resident population is called into constant action, and in providing the means of doing so, the whole trade of the place is comprehended. The old wooden pier, though it had at a recent period been faced with stone, was, by a violent tempest in the month of January, 1808, nearly destroyed, as well as a considerable part of the lower part of the town, since which a new pier has been constructed at an expense of £100,000. It is built of Whitby stone, forming a portion of a polygon, 900 feet in length from E. to W., 60 feet wide, where broadest, and 26 feet in height, with a parapet of 4 feet 6 inches. It is divided into two stages of building, the one raised 7 feet and a half above the other. The lower part forms the quay, the higher forms a fashionable lounge for the summer visitants, being 18 feet in breadth, having a parapet on the side toward the sea, and an iron railing towards the land. It is protected by a canvas awning, brilliantly lighted with gas, and for the amusement of those who frequent it, has an excellent band of music stationed within it. A difficulty having been found in landing passengers from the steam-boats on the pier at low water, a wooden pier has been carried out into the sea, the length of 1120 feet, on which the passengers are landed with ease and safety at the very lowest time of the tide. It is constructed entirely of English oak, and was erected at an expense of £8000. At low water this also forms a most delightful promenade. Being a member of the port of Dover, the mayor of that town appoints one of the inhabitants to act as his deputy. Two local magistrates have of late years been added, and there is a court of requests held regularly for the recovery of small debts. The market-days are Wednesday and Saturday. There are, besides the established church, places of worship for the Society of Friends, the Baptists, and the Roman Catholics. The national school affords gratuitous instruction to nearly 500 children. The principal charitable institutions are Draper's hospital for aged women, founded in 1709, by Michael Youkley, a member of the Society of Friends, and the sea-bathing infirmary, projected by Dr Lettsom, and established in 1792, under the patronage of George III. There are also a great number of charitable bequests, which it would be tedious and unprofitable to particularize. Distance from London, 72½ m. E. Pop., in 1801, 4766; in 1831, 10,339. A. P., £25,437.

MARHAM, a parish in the hundred of Clack-close, co. of Norfolk. Living, a discharged rectory in the archd. and dio. of Norwich, rated at £6 13s. 4d., returned at £140. Church ded. to the Holy Trinity. Patrons, the dean and chapter of Norwich. Here was a nunnery of Cisterians to the honour of the blessed Virgin Mary, built and endowed by Isabella de Albini, countess of Arundel, in 1251. At the dissolution, it contained an abbess and eight nuns, having an annual revenue of £42 4s. 7d. Distance from Swaffham, 7½ m. W. by N. Pop., in 1801, 491; in 1831, 799. A. P., £3,286.

MARLBOROUGH, a borough and town, having separate jurisdiction, locally situated in the hundred of Selkley, co. of Wilts, divided into the parishes of St Mary and St Peter and St Paul, both in the archd. of Wilts and dio. of Salisbury. The former is a discharged vicarage, rated at £10 9s. 4d. The church—a very ancient structure with a freestone tower—is ded. to the Blessed Virgin Mary. Patron, the dean of Salisbury. The latter is a discharged rectory, rated at £12. The church—a handsome structure, having a lofty square tower crowned with battlements and pinnacles—is ded. to St Peter and St Paul. Patron, the bishop of Salisbury. Marlborough is pleasantly situated on the banks of the Kennet, and, lying on the great road from Bath to London, is a great thoroughfare. It is nearly comprised in one long street running from east to west, which is paved and lighted with gas. The buildings are irregular, many of the older ones being constructed of wood with curiously carved ornaments in front. Brick and stone form the materials of the more modern ones. On the north side of the street, a piazza projecting in front of the houses, serves for a promenade in wet weather. Near the centre of the town stands the town-hall, or court-house, built over the market place, and divided into a council-chamber, a court room, and an assembly room. Malting, rope and sacking making, are carried on to some extent here, and being one of the principal marts for the agricultural products of North Wiltshire, especially corn and cheese, a great deal of business is transacted at the weekly markets, which are held on Wednesday and Saturday. Fairs are held July 11th, August 22d, and November 23d. The government is vested in a mayor, 2 justices, 12 aldermen, 24 burgesses, a town-clerk, &c. It sends two members to parliament. The number of electors is now 300, it was formerly only 10. A castle was built here soon after the conquest, the site of which is now occupied by that large house now the Castle-inn. "A priory of the Sempringham order, dedicated to St Margaret," was founded here in the reign of King John. Its revenues at the dissolution were estimated at £38 19s. 2d. To the priory were annexed two hospitals—St John's and St Thomas's. Here was also a house of White friars. Besides the established churches, there are here places of worship for the Independents, the Wesleyan Methodists, and the Huntingdonians. The free grammar school, endowed with the revenue of the dissolved hospital of St John, between £200 and £300 per annum, educates about 20 children. No one can be admitted on the foundation unless his parents have been resident in the town for seven years. The scholars share alternately with those of the schools of Manchester and Hereford, in sixteen exhibitions at Brazen-nose, Oxford, and an equal number at St John's, Cambridge. A national school is supported by voluntary contributions. An hospital, formerly supported by the corporation, has been nearly a century ago given up to the parish officers, who have converted it into a workhouse. John Hughes, author of the Siege of Damascus, and one of the writers in the Spectator, was a native of this place, as was the well-known demagogue Dr Henry Sacheverel. Distance from London, 75 m. Church ded. to All Saints. Patrons, the dean and chapter of Gloucester. The town—which consists of two principal streets, crossing each other at the market place—is situated on the north bank of the Thames. It contains some good houses and a handsome town-hall. A new bridge has been of late thrown over the river, and the foot-paths paved, much to the convenience of the inhabitants as well as to the appearance of the place. Black silk, lace, and paper, are manufactured here; and at Temple-mills, a short distance from the town, are an extensive manufactory of copper and brass, a mill for pressing oil from rape and linseed, with several paper mills. The market day is Saturday, and there are fairs May 2d and October 29th. Horse races are run in the neighbourhood in the month of July. Two members are regularly returned to parliament. The principal civil officer is a high-constable, and the petty sessions for the hundred meet here. the archd. of Barnstaple and dio. of Exeter, rated at £24 8s. 6½d. Church ded. to St Michael. Patron, St John's college, Cambridge. Here is a school with a small endowment. Distance from Barnstaple, 3 m. N.W. Pop., in 1801, 632; in 1831, 944. A. P., £4,124.

MARWOOD, a township in the parish of Gainford, co.-palatine of Durham. This is supposed to have been at one time a town of considerable consequence. Distance from Barnard-Castle, 3 m. N.N.W. Pop., in 1801, 156; in 1831, 200. A. P., £2,673.

MARY'S (St), a parish in the liberty of Romney-Marsh—locally in the hundred of New Church—lathe of Shepway, co. of Kent. Living, a rectory in the archd. and dio. of Canterbury, rated at £23 3s. 9d. Patron, the archbishop of Canterbury. Distance from New Romney, 2½ m. N. Pop., in 1801, 45; in 1831, 111. A. P., £4,915.

MARY'S (St) IN ARDEN, a parish partly in the hundred of Gartree, co. of Leicester, and partly in the hundred of Rothwell, co. of Northampton. Living, a curacy in the archd. and dio. of Leicester, not in charge. Patron, Christ Church college, Oxford. Distance from Market-Harborough, 1 m. E. The returns are included in those of the parish of Little Bowden.

MARY-LE-BONE (St), a parish in Holborn division of the hundred of Ossulstone, co. of Middlesex. Living, a curacy or donative in the archd. of Middlesex and dio. of London. The church—a spacious and handsome structure on the south side of the New Road, opposite York gate, Regent's Park, having in front a noble Corinthian portico, surmounted by a tower and cupola—was consecrated in the month of February, 1817. The duke of Portland is patron, and holds the inappropriate rectory. There are in the parish four district churches, all rectories, and in the patronage of the crown. The first of these, St Mary's, Wyndham-place, Bryanstone-square, was consecrated in January, 1824. It is built of brick, having a fine Ionic portico, contains 1820 sittings, and cost nearly £19,000.—All Souls, Langham-place, Oxford-street, was consecrated in 1825. It has at the west end a projecting circular portico of the Ionic order, terminating in a spire, 1761 sittings, and cost nearly £18,000.—Christ church, Stafford-street, Lisson-Grove, was consecrated 1828. It is built of brick, has also an Ionic portico, and cost nearly £18,000.—Trinity church, Portland-road, was consecrated 1828. It is built of brick, having on each side a range of Ionic pillars supporting a cornice and balustrade, having at the west end an Ionic portico, above which is a square tower, surmounted by a small campanile turret, surrounded by pillars of the composite order, supporting a conical dome. It cost nearly £22,000. The old parish church in High-street is now a chapel-of-ease, a curacy, in the patronage of the rector of the parish, and there is St John's chapel, also a curacy, in the patronage of the crown. There are in addition to all these, ten proprietary episcopal chapels besides places of worship for Baptists, Independents, Wesleyan and Calvinistic Methodists, Scottish Seceders, Christians of the Greek church, and for French and Spanish Roman Catholics. This district—now covered with elegant buildings inhabited by the first families in the kingdom—was at a period by no means remote, an obscure village difficult of access, and containing only a few solitary houses with a small church, which was removed as being, from its lonely situation, exposed to continual depredation. A small brook ran past it from which London was partly supplied with water. It is now carried off by a subterranean channel. Mary-le-Bone park, now covered with buildings, was an extensive tract well-stocked with deer, in which Queen Elizabeth entertained the Russian ambassador with a splendid hunting match, and behind the old manor house were extensive gardens much frequented as a place of public entertainment in the reign of Queen Ann. To give any thing like a description of this parish would require a volume; we can only name a few of the more remarkable places. Among the earlier places of note are Cavendish-square, having in the centre an equestrian statue of William, duke of Cumberland. Manchester-square and Portman-square, the centre of which is most beautifully laid out in plantations and walks. Portland-place, opening at the northern extremity in Park-crescent and commanding a delightful view of the Regent's-park, bounded by the Hampstead and Highgate hills. Of more recent erection are Bryanstone and Montague squares, having gardens in the centre of the area, to which we may add Blandford and Dorset squares, Lisson-grove, and St John's wood. Upon the crescents and terraces we cannot enter, and for the parks and gardens, see LONDON. Here are numerous schools and charitable institutions. By the recent reform act, the Mary-le-Bone district, comprising the several parishes of Mary-le-Bone, St Pancras, and Paddington, returns two members to parliament. The number of electors is about 21,600. Distance from St Paul's, $2\frac{1}{2}$ m. W.N.W. Pop., in 1801, 63,982; in 1831, 122,206. A. P., £692,085.

MARY-CHURCH (St), a parish in the hundred of Haytor, co. of Devon. Living, a discharged vicarage in the archd. of Totness and dio. of Exeter, rated at £31 11s. Patron, the dean and chapter of Exeter. There is here a small sum bequeathed for the educating of poor boys. Distance from Torbay, 2 m. N.W. Pop., in 1801, 801; in 1831, 1204. A. P., £3,830.

MARY (St), otherwise WESTON, a parish in the hundred of Bishops-Waltham, Portsdown division of the co. of Southampton. Living, a curacy, a peculiar in the jurisdiction and patronage of the bishop of Winchester, rated at £37 5s. 5d. Pop., in 1801, 617; in 1831, 1068. A. P., £1,825.

MARY'S (St), a parish in the liberty of Romney-Marsh, lathe of Shepway, co. of Kent. Living, a rectory in the archd. and dio. of Canterbury, rated at £23 3s. 9d. Patron, the archbishop of Canterbury. Distance from Romney, 2 m. N.E. Pop., in 1801, 45; in 1831, 111. A. P., £4,915.

MARY-CHURCH (St), a parish in the hundred of Cowbridge, co. of Glamorgan, South Wales. Living, a curacy in the archd. and dio. of Llandaff, rated at £5 6s. 8d., returned at £110. Patron, Sir J. Aubrey. This parish is famed for its pastures, its sweet mutton, and its fine wool. Distance from Cowbridge, $1\frac{1}{2}$ m. S. Pop., in 1801, 115; in 1831, 150. A. P., £747.

MARY-HILL (St), a parish in the hundred of Agmore, co. of Glamorgan, South Wales. Living, a discharged rectory in the dio. of Llandaff, rated at £5 11s. 3d. Patron, T. Mansel Talbot, Esq. Distance from Cowbridge, 4 m. N.W. Pop., in 1801, 198; in 1831, 257. A. P., £611.

MARY-IN-THE-MARSH (St), a chapelry in the parish of Newton, hundred of Wisboach, co. of Cambridge. Living, a curacy to the rectory of Newton, exempt from visitation, in the dio. of Ely, not in charge. Patron, the rector of Newton. Returns with the parish.

MARY'S (St), the principal of the Scilly islands. It extends in length about $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles, and in breadth about $1\frac{1}{2}$. The surface rises in some places into considerable elevations, the vales being fertile and the hills rich in minerals. The capital is New-Town, situated at the base of Garrison hill, where there are a custom-house, a town-house, and a prison. It has a harbour defended by a pier having from three to five fathoms water, but the entrance is difficult; it is commanded by a small fort called Star-castle, in which the standard is hoisted daily. The church is at Church-Town about a mile from the harbour. The governorship is a place of some emolument, and is vested in the duke of Leeds. Pop., in 1831, 1311.

MARY-HOO (St), a parish in the hundred of Hoo, lathe of Aylesbury, co. of Kent. Living, a rectory in the archd. and dio. of Rochester, rated at £16 12s. 1d. Patroness, in 1829, Mrs Burt. Distance from Rochester, $6\frac{1}{2}$ m. N.N.E. Pop., in 1801, 214; in 1831, 296. A. P., £1,870.

MARYPORT, a sea-port town and chapelry in the parish of Cross-Canonby, co. of Cumberland. Living, a curacy in the archd. and dio. of Carlisle, returned at £109. Patron, in 1829, H. Senhouse, Esq. The town is situated on the north bank of the Ellen, where it enters the Irish sea, and from a small fishing village has risen into a neat, well-built, and busily employed commercial town. Its principal trade is in coals, for shipping which wooden piers and quays have been constructed along the shore. Ship-building is carried on to a considerable extent, and many large vessels for the American, the West Indian, and Baltic trades, are constructed here. Its manufactures are cotton and linen checks, earthenware, leather, nails, anchors, and sail-cloth. The sand being here very fine, the town is crowded during the summer season with strangers, who wish to enjoy the luxury of sea-bathing. Here are places of worship for different bodies of dissenters; and a school upon the Madras system, supported by subscription, which educates about 150 children. Distance from London, 311 m. N.W. by N. Pop., in 1801, 2932; in 1831, 3877. A. P., £2,554.

MARY-STOW, a parish in the hundred of Lifton, co. of Devon. Living, a vicarage with the curacy of Thrushelton, in the archd. of Totness and dio. of Exeter, rated at £12 16s. 0½d. Church—having an ancient stone font and two stone stalls—ded. to St Mary. Patron, in 1829, the Rev. H. H. Tremayne. Distance from Tavistock, 6½ m. N.N.W. Pop., in 1801, 297; in 1831, 508. A. P., £2,382.

MARY-TAVY, a parish in the hundred of Lifton, co. of Devon. Distance from Oakhampton, 10 m. S.W. Pop., in 1801, 376; in 1831, 1123. A. P., £7,659.

MASHAM, a market-town and parish, partly within the liberty of St Peter of York, but principally in the E. division of the wapentake of Hang, N. R. of the co. of York. Living, a vicarage with that of Kirkby-Malzeard, a peculiar, the jurisdiction still in dispute between the court of Masham and the dean and chapter of York, rated at £30. It was formerly a prebend, the richest in the cathedral church of York. Church—small but beautiful, having a lofty and elegant spire—ded. to St Mary. Patrons, the master and fellows of Trinity college, Cambridge. The town is pleasantly situated on the south bank of the Ure, in the midst of a fertile district. It is well-built, and highly celebrated for the salubrity of its atmosphere. The spinning of woollen-yarn is the only manufactory here worth noticing. The market-day is Wednesday; and there are fairs on the 17th and 18th September. During the spring months, a cattle and sheep market is held every alternate Monday. Here are places of worship for the Society of Friends, the Baptists, and the Wesleyan Methodists. There are a grammar school with an endowment of £50 per annum, and a charity school for 36 poor children with £24. They are both in the hands of one master. Two Sabbath schools are supported by subscription. Distance from London, 223 m. N.N.W. Pop., in 1801, of the town, 1012; of the entire parish, 2520: in 1831, of the town, 1276; of the entire parish, 2995. A. P. of the town, £2,886; of the entire parish, £13,614.

MATLASK, a parish in the hundred of North Erpingham, co. of Norfolk. Living, a discharged rectory in the archd. of Norfolk and dio. of Norwich, rated at £5, returned at £122 9s. Church ded. to St Peter. Patron, the chancellor of the duchy of Lancaster. Distance from Holt, 6 m. S.E. Pop., in 1801, 166; in 1831, 218. A. P., £508.

MATLEY, a township in the parish of Mottram, co. palatine of Chester. Distance from Stockport, 7 m. N.E. by E. Pop., in 1801, 285; in 1831, 262. A. P., £951.

MATLOCK, a parish in the hundred of Wirksworth, co. of Derby. Living, a rectory in the archd. of Derby and dio. of Lichfield and Coventry, rated at £11 2s. 6d. The church—a very ancient structure, most romantically situated on the verge of a precipitous rock, imbosomed in the thick foliage of surrounding trees—is ded. to St Giles. Patron the dean of Lincoln. The village of Matlock stands on the banks of the Derwent, over which is here a neat stone bridge, in a situation the most romantic that can well be imagined; the houses, built on the steep acclivity of a mountain, rise above one another in gradual succession from the base nearly to the summit, presenting to the eye of a stranger a prospect equally novel and interesting. Cotton and lead form the two articles upon which the greater part of the population is employed, the latter of very long standing, and the former introduced by the late Sir Richard Arkwright. The celebrity of the place, however, arises principally from its medicinal springs, and the surpassing beauty and grandeur of its scenery. Its springs are hot, though less so than those of Bristol. They are supposed to acquire their heat by passing through a stratum of limestone, as it is only on a certain level that they are obtained; all the springs met with, and there are many of them, either above or below that level, being cold. The mineral impregnation of these waters is exceedingly slight, consisting chiefly of calcareous earth, held in solution by carbonic acid, and being lighter, they may be presumed to be more pure than common water. They are used externally and internally, and are supposed to be particularly efficacious in those diseases termed glandular and nervous, for which medical science has as yet found out no certain or effectual remedy. Invalids have abundance of accommodation prepared for them. The hotels are excellent, and lodging houses are numerous and respectable. Here is a museum of minerals for the curious in geology, an excellent library for such as are studious of books, and for the admirers of external nature, excellent roads and fine walks have been constructed through the woods, and to all the eminences from which the inimitable beauties of Matlockdale can be seen to advantage. The Independents have here a place of worship, and there is a free school for all the children of the parish, endowed with about £45 per annum. Distance from London, 144 m. N.N.W. Pop., in 1801, 2354; in 1831, 3262. A. P., £7,582.

MATSON, a parish in the middle division of the hundred of Dudstone and King's-Barton. Living, a discharged vicarage in the archd. and dio. of Gloucester, rated at £3 16s. 5½d. MELTON-MOWBRAY, a market-town and parish in the hundred of Framland, co. of Leicester. Living, a vicarage in the archd. of Leicester and dio. of Lincoln, rated at £16 8s. 9d. The church—a spacious and lofty structure—is ded. to St Mary. Patron, in 1829, Peter Godfrey, Esq. The town, which is small but very neatly built, is situated on the direct road from London to Leeds, in a valley on the little river Eye, over which it has two good bridges. The streets are paved and well lighted, some unknown benefactor having left an estate which now yields £800 per annum for that purpose. The market, held every Tuesday, is considered one of the best frequented cattle markets in England; and it has fairs on Monday and Tuesday after the 17th January, March 13th, May 4th, Whit-Tuesday, August 21st, and September 7th, principally for horses, cattle, and sheep. This is one of the polling places in the election of members for the northern division of the co. A court leet and baron is held every three weeks. Bobbinet is extensively made here, and some hosiery. The principal attraction and main source of its improvement is the subscription hunt, to which it gives name, unquestionably the most celebrated in the kingdom. The season lasts five months, from November to March, during which the town is frequented by the leading sportsmen from all parts of the kingdom. Stabling is provided for 700 horses, and there is a good library and news-room. Here are places of worship for the Independents and the Wesleyan Methodists. There are two excellent free schools, in which are generally about 300 scholars, and an hospital for six poor men and six poor women, who receive each by quarterly payments £13 per annum. Orator Henley, whose 'gilt tub' still glitters in the satire of Pope, was a native of this place. Distance from London, 105 m. N.W. Pop., in 1801, 1957; in 1821, 3520. A. P., £16,685.

MERIONETHSHIRE,

A county of North Wales, bounded on the north and north-east by the counties of Carnarvon and Denbigh; on the east, south-east, and south, by the counties of Montgomery and Cardigan; and on the west by the Irish sea. It forms an irregular triangle, having its apex to the south, its extreme length being about 43 miles, and its extreme breadth 35. It has been calculated to contain 500,000 acres, of which not more than 50,000 are arable. The surface is broken and rugged, rising often into elevations, as in the Mowddwy and Cader Iris, of nearly 3000 feet above the level of the sea, and sinking into rugged dells and sequestered valleys of the most sublime and picturesque character. Numerous torrents descend from the mountains, many of them very considerable streams; but its principal rivers are the Dyfi, the Glaslyn, the Drwryd, the Avon, and the Dera, or Dee, one of the noblest British streams, which has its sources in this county. The rivers and the numerous lakes abound in fish, particularly the guiniad, salmon, and trout. The air is sharp, especially on the mountains, and the soil thin and poor, but the inhabitants are generally healthy, and many of them live to a great age. The rural economy of the county is confined almost solely to the breeding of sheep and small horned cattle. The genuine Welsh pony—nearly extinct in every other part of the principality—is still bred here in its primitive beauty of form, and with all its native excellencies. Coarse cloths, kerseymeres, druggets, flannels, and stockings, are made in various places, but the staple of the county is slate, vast quantities of which are exported. The county is in the dio. of Bangor. It sends one member to parliament, is divided into 6 hundreds, comprising 37 parishes and 4 market towns. Pop., in 1801, 27,506; in 1831, 34,500. A. P., £111,436.

MERTHYR-TYDFIL, a town and parish in the hundred of Caerphilly, co. of Glamorgan, South Wales. Living, a rectory in the archd. and dio. of Llandaff, rated at £20 5s. 7½d. Patron, the marquess of Bute. The town stands upon the river Taff in a bleak and sterile country, and though built without any regularity of plan is large and populous. It is one of the polling places for the county members, and now returns a member for itself. About half a century ago it was an insignificant village, and has risen to its present importance solely in consequence of the iron works first established by Mr Anthony Bacon, who upon a 99 years' lease of a tract of land 8 m. long by 5 broad, commenced to work coal and iron here about 1755. Having realised a splendid fortune, Mr Bacon disposed of his interest in the district to different companies, which has greatly increased the extent of the business. The Cyfartha, the Plymouth, the Dowlais, and the Penydarren works are all upon a most extensive scale, the Cyfartha especially, which is said to be the most extensive in the kingdom. Wrought into bars, the iron is transported to Pennarth the port of Cardiff, by the Glamorganshire canal and the adjacent railroad, whence it is sent to the home and foreign markets. About a thousand tons are supposed to be forged weekly, with a consumption of an equal quantity of coals. The first dissenting congregation in Wales was formed in this parish, 1620. There are now several of them. Schools are numerous in the parish, supported chiefly by subscription. The market-days are Wednesday and Saturday, and there are fairs held on a hill about a mile distant from the town, May 13th, Trinity-Monday, September 2d and 24th, Monday after October 10th, and November 30th. Distance from London, 171 m. W. Pop., in 1801, 7705; in 1831, 22,083. A. P., £15,720.

MIDDLESEX,

An inland county, bounded by Hertfordshire on the N., by Surrey and Kent on the S., by Essex on the E., and by Buckinghamshire on the W. In point of extent it is one of the smallest counties in England, being from E. to W. only about 23 miles in length, and in breadth from N. to S. about 17 miles. The whole county forms only a demeane to the metropolis, and is in a great measure occupied by splendid mansions, commodious seats, and elegant villas, belonging to noblemen, gentlemen, and opulent tradesmen, whose ambition, whose business, or whose pleasures, connect them with that great and still rapidly growing city. A large portion of the soil is taken up with the innumerable roads which here meet as in a common centre from all parts of the kingdom, and a large portion is laid out in pastures, gardens, &c., for the sustenance and the amusement of the immense population with which it is crowded. The soil, though a great part of it in the south side of the county especially seems to be alluvial, is not naturally fertile, consisting generally of sand and gravel; by constant culture, however, and the application of the abundant manure furnished by the metropolis, the whole tract bordering on the Thames has been converted into rich gardens, fruitful corn-fields, verdant lawns, and luxuriant pastures. Towards the N. there are still extensive tracts of uncultivated land covered with furze and heath, some of them at no great distance from London. What are here called hills, are only paltry elevations, not one of them rising more than 400 feet above the level of the sea. Of these elevations the principal are Harrow-hill, the hills of Hendon, Highwood, Barret, and Breckley, one between Barret and Elstree, with Highgate and Hampstead hills.—The principal rivers are the Lea, which forms the boundary of the county on the E., the Coln, which forms its boundary on the W., and the Thames, which forms its southern boundary. To these we may add the Cran and the Brent. By the Thames, and the rivers and canals connected with it, the county enjoys to a great extent the benefits of inland navigation, and the roads are everywhere of the best description.—The rural economy of the county may be ranged under the heads of gardening and grazing. Very little corn is grown, though, where it is grown, it is of excellent quality. In the gardens and nurseries are cultivated and reared all kinds of fruit and forest trees, many of them being transported to the continent of Europe. Among the products of the kitchen-garden, beans and pease form conspicuous articles. They are podded green and sent to the London-market. The object of the graziers here being the supplying of the London market, the county has no particular breed of cattle. Most of the calves are suckled for eight or ten weeks, when they are sold to the butcher. Early house lambs are also reared for the London-market. Upwards of 8000 cows are kept for supplying the metropolis with milk; they are generally of the Holderness breed, of a large size, with short horns, celebrated for the quantity of their milk, though it is said to be deficient in quality. Upwards of 70,000 acres of rich meadow-land are appropriated to the feeding of these cows and the making of hay, these meadows being mown once, many of them three times, every year. Few horses are bred in the county, the farmers supplying themselves at the neighbouring fairs, or at the stables of the London dealers. The draught horses used by the brewers and distillers are of Flemish origin, and unequalled for strength and beauty.—This county is in the province of Canterbury and dio. of London, forming a deanery and an archdeanery, and comprises, exclusive of the cities of London and Westminster, 70 parishes. It is divided into six hundreds, has two cities, London and Westminster, and seven market-towns. It sends two members to parliament besides the metropolitan members. For what more particularly belongs to this county, see the articles LONDON and WESTMINSTER. Pop., in 1801, 818,129; in 1831, 1,358,200. A. P., £5,595,537.

Church ded. to the Holy Trinity. Patrons, the dean and chapter of Canterbury. The town—which is of great antiquity, probably deriving its origin from a castelated mansion founded by the successors of Hengist, king of Kent—is situated at the head of a creek which opens into the channel between the isle of Sheppey and the coast of Kent. The port admits barges, and as well as the town is under the government of a portreeve, whose authority as supervisor of weights and measures extends over the hundred. This officer is elected annually by the suffrages of all who pay poor-rates. The trade of the town consists chiefly in shipping for the London market the agricultural produce of the neighbourhood, and bringing goods in return. A great number of the inhabitants find employment in the oyster fishery on the Swale, which is held in lease from the lords of the manors by the Company of Free Dredgers, about 140 in number. The beds are under peculiar management and special regulations, in consequence of which the oysters known by the name of Milton natives, are in high request. The Rutupian oysters, recorded by Juvenal as of so much consequence to the gastronomists of ancient Rome, are supposed to have been no other than Milton natives. MILVERTON, a market-town and parish in the hundred of Milverton, co. of Somerset. Living, a vicarage with the curacy of Langford-Budville, in the archd. of Taunton and dio. of Bath and Wells, rated at £21 19s. 2d. Church ded. to St Michael. Patron, the archd. of Taunton. The town is pleasantly situated upon an eminence above the western extremity of the vale of Taunton-Dean, over the whole of which it commands an uninterrupted prospect. It is small, consisting of three irregular streets neither paved nor lighted. Serges, druggets, and flannels are manufactured here, though they have been of late years in some degree superseded by the throwing of silk. The market is on Friday, and there is a fair on the 10th of October. Distance from London, 151 m. W.S.W. Pop., in 1801, 1667; in 1831, 2233. A. P., £11,113.

MILVERTON WITH EDMENSCOTT, a parish in Kenilworth division of the hundred of Knightlow, co. of Warwick. Living, a curacy in the archd. of Coventry and dio. of Lichfield and Coventry, certified at £5 6s. 8d., returned at £58. Church ded. to St James. Patron, in 1829, the earl of Warwick. This parish lies in the centre of an extensive and graceful sweep of the Avon, commanding one of the most luxuriant midland prospects in the kingdom. Distance from Warwick, 2 m. N.N.E. Pop., in 1801, 230; in 1831, 537. A. P., £3,009.

and dio. of Lichfield and Coventry, rated at £4 3s. 4d., returned at £100. Church ded. to All Saints. Patron, in 1829, Lewis G. Dyre, Esq. There is here a bequest of £5, upon which 10 children are instructed. Distance from Stone, 5 m. E.S.E. Pop., in 1801, 497; in 1831, 551. A. P., £3,019.

MIMMS (NORTH), a parish in the hundred of Dacorum, co. of Hertford. Living, a discharged vicarage in the archd. of Huntingdon and dio. of Lincoln, rated at £10. The church—built of flint, with a square tower surmounted by a lofty spire—is ded. to St Mary. Patroness, in 1829, Mrs Gaussen. Distance from Bishop's Hatfield, 4 m. S.S.W. Pop., in 1801, 838; in 1831, 1068. A. P., £8,599.

MIMMS (SOUTH), a parish in the hundred of Edmonton, co. of Middlesex. Living, a discharged vicarage in the archd. of Middlesex and dio. of London, rated at £12 3s. 4d. Church ded. to St Giles. Patron, W. P. Hammond, Esq. Distance from Chipping-Barnet, 3½ m. N.N.W. Pop., in 1801, 1698; in 1831, 2010. A. P., £15,025.

MINCARLO, one of the smaller of the Scilly islands, containing about 12 acres of ground, and lying 4 m. W. of St Mary's isle.

MINCHINHAMPTON, a town and parish in the hundred of Langtree, co. of Gloucester, now included within the boundaries of the borough of Stroud. Living, a rectory in the archd. and dio. of Gloucester, rated at £41 13s. 4d. Church—a large cruciform structure—ded. to the Holy Trinity. Patron, in 1829, the Rev. William Cockin. The town consists of one long irregular street, extending from N. to S., in the line of the high-road to Chippenham, and this crossed by another leading to the parish church, near which stands the market-house. The right of holding a free market every Tuesday, and two annual fairs, Trinity-Monday and October 10th, was obtained by the abbess of Caen—the manor having been gifted to the nunnery there—from Henry III., and renewed in 1545, in favour of the then lord of the manor, Andrew, Lord Windsor. The manufacture of woollen cloth was at one time very extensively carried on here, clothing mills having been erected on the numerous streams by which the surrounding valleys are intersected, but it has for some time been on the decline. There is here a very extensive intrenchment, extending nearly 3 miles, from the hamlet of Littleworth to a valley on the opposite side of the town called Woeful Danes Bottom, supposed to be Danish. From the epithet applied to the vale, it has been conjectured to have been the scene of a great overthrow to the Danes, perhaps the much disputed site of the battle of Ethandun, in which Alfred, in 879, defeated them with immense slaughter. There are here a place of worship for the Baptists, a free school, and a national school, supported by subscription. At Snickley, a hamlet in the parish, there is a school for writing and arithmetic, liberally endowed. Distance from London, 99 m. W.N.W. Pop., in 1801, 5077; in 1831, 7255. A. P., £14,232.

MINCHINTON, a tything in the parish of

Handley, co. of Dorset, 7 m. W.N.W. from Cranborne.

MINDTOWN, a parish in the hundred of Puralow, co. of Salop. Living, a discharged rectory in the archd. of Salop and dio. of Hereford, rated at £4 13s. 4d., returned at £60. Church ded. to St John the Baptist. Patron, in 1829, the earl of Powis. Distance from Bishop's-Castle, 5 m. E.N.E. Pop., in 1801, 88; in 1831, 36. A. P., £626.

MINEHEAD, a borough and parish in the hundred of Carhampton, co. of Somerset. Living, a vicarage in the archd. of Taunton and dio. of Bath and Wells, rated at £18 9s. 7d., returned at £140. Church ded. to St Michael. Patron, the lord of the manor. The town is situated on the Bristol channel, having a harbour, safe, commodious, and of easy access, which circumstance, with its vicinity to Wales and Ireland, rendered it at a very early period a place of some importance. The town consists of three divisions, or distinct assemblages of houses, arranged in the form of a triangle, each side of which extends about two-thirds of a mile. The upper town comprises some irregular streets, the houses of which are very mean, on the eastern declivity of a steep and rugged hill called Minehead-point. The middle part, about half a mile from the sea, is the principal part, having many good houses, and some very respectable inns. The third division is the quay-town, or part close on the water-side. Here there is a custom-house, with a collector and comptroller. There is also a harbour master. About the beginning of last century, in consequence of the quay being rebuilt, and the harbour cleared out, so as to admit vessels of great burden, the trade of this port rose rapidly, and it had numerous vessels trading to Ireland, America, and the Mediterranean. Since that period it has declined. At present its commerce is chiefly carried on coastwise; its exports being corn, malt, flour, and timber; its imports, groceries from Bristol, coal and culm from Swansea, Neath, and Newport, limestone from Wales, and live stock from Ireland. The market is on Wednesday; and there is a fair the Wednesday in Whitsunweek. Possessing a fine sandy beach, with a neighbourhood remarkable for the variety and the beauty of its scenery, with great salubrity of climate, Minehead has become a favourite watering-place, and a general resort of fashionable valetudinarians during the summer months. Formerly it sent two members to parliament, but in the new reform bill is included among the disfranchised boroughs. Here is a free school for 20 boys, supported by the lord of the manor, and there are a number of benefactions for distribution among the poor. Distance from London, 160 m. W.S.W. Pop., in 1801, 1168; in 1831, 1481. A. P., £4,255.

MINETY, a parish in the hundred of Crowthorne and Minety, co. of Gloucester, though partly in the hundred of Malmesbury, co. of Wilts. Living, a discharged vicarage in the archd. of Wilts and dio. of Salisbury, rated at £7 7s. 6d. Church ded. to St Leonard. Patron, the archdeacon of Wilts. Distance from Malmesbury, 5½

m. N.E. by E. Pop., in 1801, 479; in 1831, 585. A. P., £4,934.

MINSHULL-CHURCH, a parish in the hundred of Nantwich, co.-palatine of Chester. Living, a curacy in the archd. and dio. of Chester, certified at £23 12s. 6d., returned at £135. Church ded. to St Bartholomew. Patron, in 1829, T. Brook, Esq. Here are a place of worship for the Independents, and a school with a small endowment. Distance from Nantwich, 5½ m. N.E. Pop., in 1801, 417; in 1831, 468. A. P., £3,500.

MINSHULL-VERNON, a township in the parish of Middlewich, co.-palatine of Chester. Distance from Middlewich, 4 m. S.S.W. Pop., in 1801, 357; in 1831, 385. A. P., £3,146.

MINSKIP, a township in the parish of Aldborough, W. R. of the co. of York. Distance from Boroughbridge, 1½ m. S.W. Pop., in 1801, 204; in 1831, 267. A. P., £2,227.

MINESTEAD, a parish in the hundred of New-Forest, East, co. of Southampton. Living, a rectory in the archd. and dio. of Winchester, rated at £7 12s. 6d. Church ded. to All Saints. Patron, in 1829, H. C. Compton, Esq. A triangular stone in this parish marks the site of the tree from which the arrow glanced that killed William Rufus. Distance from Lyndhurst, 2½ m. N.N.W. Pop., in 1801, 764; in 1831, 1074. A. P., £2,146.

MINSTER, a parish in the hundred of Lesnewth, co. of Cornwall. Living, a discharged rectory in the archd. of Cornwall and dio. of Exeter, rated at £22 17s. 11d. Church ded. to St Methewian. Patrons, T. J. Philips, Esq. Distance from Bassiney, 3½ m. E.N.E. Pop., in 1801, 311; in 1831, 497. A. P., £2,039.

MINSTER, a parish in the hundred of Kingslow or isle of Thanet, lathe of St Augustine, co. of Kent. Living, a vicarage in the archd. and dio. of Canterbury, rated at £33 3s. 4d. Church—having a lofty spire, and in the choir 14 stalls—is ded. to St Mary. Patron, the archbishop of Canterbury. A market, formerly kept here, has gone into desuetude, but the fair on Good Friday for pedlery and toys is still observed. Here was a nunnery to the honour of the Virgin Mary, founded, and with the assistance of her uncle, King Egbert, endowed by Domneva about the year 970, who placed in it her daughter St Mildred, abbess over 70 nuns. This house had the misfortune to be several times sacked by the Danes, particularly in 1011, after which it never had any more nuns. The monks of Canterbury having shortly after obtained a grant of the church and lands from Canute, translated the body of St Mildred also to their own church. A little to the E. of the church is Ebbsfleet, remarkable as the landing-place, in 449, of Hengist and Horsa, on their first visit to Britain,—of St Austral, the apostle of the English in 596,—and of St Mildred, to take charge of the nuns of St Mary's some time after 670. Distance from Ramsgate, 4½ m. W.S.W. Pop., in 1801, 707; in 1831, 911. A. P., £8,949.

MINSTER-IN-SHEPPY, a parish in the liberty of the isle of Sheppy, lathe of Scray, co. of Kent. Living, a curacy in the archd. and dio. of Canterbury, returned at £120. Church—a very ancient structure—ded. to St Mary and St Sexburga. Patron, in 1829, R. Mitchell, Esq. Here was a monastery, founded by Sexburga in 675, and endowed with lands obtained by grant from her son, King Egbert, for the maintenance of 77 nuns. The nuns having been slain, and the house totally destroyed by the Danes, it was in 1130 rebuilt by William, archbishop of Canterbury, ded. to St Mary and St Sexburga, and replenished with Benedictine nuns. At the dissolution it had a prioress and 10 nuns, whose annual revenues were estimated at £122 14s. 6d. The parish church was that which belonged to this convent. The port of Sheerness, at the western extremity of the parish, was formerly within its limits, but is now a separate vill, possessing independent jurisdiction. Distance from London, 45 m. E.S.E. Pop., in 1801, 4139; in 1831, 7922. A. P., £17,754.

MINSTER-SOUTH, or SOUTH-MINSTER, a parish in the hundred of Dengey, co. of Essex. Living, a vicarage in the archd. of Essex and dio. of London, rated at £21. Church ded. to St Leonard. Patrons, the governors of the Charter-house, London. Here are a place of worship for the Independents, and a national school. Distance from Burnham, 3 m. N.E. Pop., in 1801, 1128; in 1831, 1422. A. P., £9,959.

MINSTER-LOVEL, a parish in the hundred of Chadlington, co. of Oxford. Living, a discharged vicarage in the archd. and dio. of Oxford, rated at £8 9s. 7d. Church ded. to St Kenelm. Patrons, the provost and fellows of Eton college. Here was a priory of Benedictines, a cell to the monastery of Ivery in Normandy, granted on the suppression of foreign houses to Eton college. Distance from Witney, 3 m. W.N.W. Pop., in 1801, 283; in 1831, 355. A. P., £2,597.

MINSTERLEY, a chapelry in the parish of Westbury, co. of Salop. Living, a curacy to the rectory of Westbury, in the archd. of Salop and dio. of Hereford, returned at £62 10s. Patron, the rector of Westbury. Distance from Shrewsbury, 9 m. S.W. Pop., in 1811, 705; in 1831, 809. A. P., £7,436.

MINSTERWORTH, a parish in the hundred of the duchy of Lancaster, co. of Gloucester. Living, a discharged vicarage in the archd. and dio. of Gloucester, rated at £10 13s. 4d., returned at £83 3s. 2d. Church ded. to St George. Patron, the bishop of Bristol. Here

Patroness, in 1829, Mrs Simpson. The situation of this place, in the centre of extensive grounds appropriated to the culture of aromatic and medicinal plants, with the Wandle abounding with excellent trout and remarkable for the transparency of its waters winding through them, is in the highest degree delightful. The village is irregularly built, but the houses are in general respectable, and the environs abound with elegant villas inhabited by opulent individuals, who, from the retirement and beauty of its situation, and its proximity to the metropolis, have been induced to select it as a place of residence. The business principally carried on is calico printing, for which there are extensive and excellent grounds; and on the Wandle are numerous mills for corn, logwood, tobacco, &c. The rail-road from Croydon passes through the parish. There is an annual fair on the 12th of August, which continues three days. It is within the jurisdiction of the court of requests for the hundred of Blackheath. Here are places of worship for the Independents and the Wesleyan Methodists, and there is a Sabbath school endowed with £62 per annum. Distance from London, 9 m. S.S.W. MONMOUTHSHIRE,

A maritime county, bounded on the north by Herefordshire, on the east by Gloucestershire, on the west by Glamorgan and Breconshire, and on the south-east and south by the Severn and the Bristol channel. Its extreme length is about 24 and its extreme breadth about 20 miles, comprising about 318,720 acres, of which 100,000 are considered arable, 200,000 pasture, the remainder, including woodlands, being wild and perhaps irreclaimable.

Features.—The general aspect of the county is finely diversified. The mountain ridges are sterile and afford but a scanty subsistence to the flocks which feed upon them, but the valleys and the slopes of the hills are richly chequered with thriving woods, abundant pastures, and cultivated spots of exuberant fertility. In the hundreds of Wentloog and Caldicott, sea-walls have been raised at an immense expense to keep out the sea at high tides, and in stormy weather. Some of these walls are from 12 to 14 feet in height, falling back from the sea with a gradual slope, the stone work in front being supported by a large embankment of earth. In the level of Wentloog, where they are not required to be so high, they are constructed solely of earth. Those of Caldicott extend from that village nearly the whole length to Godcliff, and those of Wentloog extend nearly sixteen miles. These extensive embankments are kept in repair by assessments upon the several proprietors in the respective levels, according to the value of the properties they possess, the whole being under the control of a court of sewers and subject to the same laws and regulations as Romney Marsh in Kent. In these levels the land is divided by parallel ditches, in some of which the water is stagnant, while in others it runs off at ebb-tide through flood-gates into the sea. The general humidity of the western districts of the kingdom is particularly felt in this county, the great estuary of the Severn attracting the clouds that rise from the western ocean; the rains along its shores on both sides are frequently heavy and of long continuance. Of the general salubrity of the atmosphere, however, the longevity of the inhabitants affords ample demonstration. The principal rivers are the Severn, the Wye, the Usk, the Rumney, the Munnow, and the Ebwy. The Severn by the time it touches this county—which it does at the angle where it receives the Wye—is a river of great magnitude, and in its progress, which is south-westerly, rapidly widens into the Bristol channel. The Wye enters this county a little to the north-east of Monmouth, at which place it receives the Munnow, and by a peculiarly winding course forming the boundary between Monmouth and Gloucestershire, falls into the Severn below Chepstow. The Usk, whose scattered sources lie among the mountains of Brecon, enters this county at Llangrundy, and flowing in a southerly direction nearly through the centre of the county, falls by a broad estuary into the Bristol channel. The valley through which this river flows is remarkable for its beauty, and the river itself, especially in floods, for its extreme impetuosity. The Rumney has its rise in the lower part of Breconshire, and forming the boundary between this county and Glamorganshire, falls into the Bristol channel below the village of Rumney. The Munnow, rising also in the mountains of Brecon, forms the boundary between this county and Herefordshire, till it falls, as we have said, into the Wye at the town of Monmouth. The Ebwy, rising in Brecon and flowing through a wildly romantic valley, to which it gives name, falls into the estuary of the Usk below Newport. Besides these rivers the long and narrow valleys of this county are enlivened and fertilized by numerous streams which it would be almost endless to particularize. All of them abound with fish, and on the Wye and the Usk are salmon fisheries of very considerable value.

Agriculture.—In an agricultural point of view the county may be divided into three districts. The first, comprising the southern part of the county, consists partly of large tracts of moor and marsh land, having in some parts a loamy soil of considerable depth, in others a great depth of black peaty matter. In some places the soil is light loam producing timber of excellent quality, in some a mixture of clay and loam forming fertile meadows, and in a few places a reddish soil well-adapted to the culture of turnips and potatoes. In the second division—which includes the eastern part of the county, and extends along the banks of the Usk—the soil is of a light red colour, and such is its fertility that the whole country has the appearance of a garden. The third division comprises the western part of the county, the soil of which, especially upon the hills, is thin and peaty, lying over strata of stone covering beds of coal or iron-ore. The crops are wheat, barley, and oats, with a few pease and beans. The common artificial grasses are also cultivated. Lime forms the principal manure, and the summer fallowing is very general. The produce is considerably greater than is required by the inhabitants, the surplus goes to the supplying of the Bristol market. The oxen are generally bred in the north part of the county and fed in the south. They are mostly of a deep red or brindled colour, short in the leg and compact in the body, growing to a large size and weighing when fattened from 7 to 9 hundred weight. The sheep are in general small, having wool of a coarse and rather short staple, but the flesh fine in the grain and of delicate flavour. The horses are of a very inferior kind, neither adapted for the road nor the labours of the field. Mules are bred in the county to a great extent and of superior quality. They are generally strong in bone, of excellent symmetry, and sell at high prices.

Manufactures.—The most important mineral productions of the county are ironstone, coal, and limestone. The smelting of the iron-ore and working it into bars forms the principal branch of manufacture. Some lead is also found, and there are tin-works at Casleon and Rogerstone. The manufacture of flannel has been long established, but it is of limited extent. Coarse cloths, woollen stockings and caps are made by the inhabitants among the mountains, and brought for sale to the fairs, but they are in small quantities. Hats are manufactured in a few places, and there are several paper-mills in the vicinity of Monmouth. The commerce of the county is carried on chiefly through Newport and Chepstow, which places see. With the exception of the parishes of Welch-Bichnor, Newton-Dixon, St Mary's, Old Castle, Llanton, and Cwnyoy, which are the three first in the dio. of Hereford, and the three last in the dio. of St David's. The county of Monmouth is in the archd. and dio. of Llandaff, province of Canterbury, and is divided into the deaneries of Abergavenny, Netherwent, Newport, and Usk, comprising 123 parishes, of which 44 are rectories, 39 vicarages, and 40 curacies. It is divided for civil purposes into the six hundreds of Abergavenny, Caldicott, Ragland, Skenfreth, Usk, and Wentlloog. It contains 7 market-town, 3 of which, Monmouth, Newport, and Usk, are boroughs and return jointly one member to parliament. It sends two members to parliament. The assizes are held at Monmouth, the quarter-sessions at Usk. Pop., in 1801, 45,582; in 1831, 98,200. A. P., £295,097.

MONMOUTH, a county town, borough, and parish, having separate jurisdiction, locally in the hundred of Skenfreth, co. of Monmouth. Living, a discharged vicarage in the archd. and dio. of Hereford, rated at £9 2s. 2d., returned at £145. The church—having an elegant and finely proportioned spire 210 feet in height—is ded. to St Mary. Patron, in 1829, the duke of Beaufort. The town is situated in a beautiful valley, surrounded with hills of various elevation, most of them richly wooded, on the river Munnow at its junction with the Wye, over which, as well as over the Munnow, it has an excellent stone bridge. Like most other towns of Roman origin, it consists of four principal streets, diverging at nearly right angles from a common centre, the greatest extension from this point being towards the north. There are here many old and curious looking buildings, yet the greater part of the houses are handsome, not a few elegant, and in the principal streets many of them have gardens and orchards attached. It is governed by a mayor, a recorder, 2 bailiffs, 15 common-councilmen, with a town-clerk, 2 sergeants-at-mace, &c. By an ancient charter the burgesses are exempted from paying toll, tonnage, pickage, or frontage, throughout England. It sends one member to parliament in conjunction with Newport and Usk. In the neighbourhood of the town are extensive iron-foundries, and on the numerous streams in the environs several extensive paper and corn mills.

By means of the Monmouth railway coal is plentifully supplied from the forest of Dean, and by the Wye an extensive commerce is carried on with Bristol. The market day is Saturday, and there is a cattle market the first Wednesday of every month. Fairs are held for toys on Whit-Tuesday, on the Wednesday before the 20th of June for wool and cheese, and on the 4th of September and the 22d of November for cattle, hops, and cheese. There are here places of worship for the Baptists, the Independents, the Wesleyan Methodists, and the Roman Catholics. There is a free grammar school liberally endowed, and a national school supported by subscription. This school is kept in a large room having a fine oriel window, part of the Benedictine priory, said to have been the study of the celebrated Geoffrey of Monmouth, who was a native of this town, and resided many years in that convent. There is an almshouse containing 20 separate tenements with a garden to each, for twenty aged men and women, who have a weekly allowance of 6s. each, besides coal and clothing. Henry V. was born here, and his cradle, with the sword he wore at Agincourt, are still preserved in Troy-house, belonging to the duke of Beaufort. Distance from London, 130 m. W.N.W. Pop., in 1801, 3345; in 1831, 4916. A. P., £12,963.

MONNINGTON-UPON-WYE, a parish in the hundred of Grimswoth, co. of Hereford. Living, a discharged rectory in the archd. and dio. of Hereford, rated at £7 12s. 10d. Church ded. to St Mary. Patron, Sir G. Cornewall. Distance from Hereford, 9 m. W.N.W. Pop., in 1801, 135; in 1831, 104. A. P., £1,176.

MONTACUTE, a parish in the hundred of Tintinhull, co. of Somerset. Living, a discharged vicarage in the archd. of Wells and dio. of Bath and Wells, rated at £8 10s., returned at £127 2s. 7d. Church ded. to St Catherine. Patron, in 1829, John Phelps, Esq. A priory to the honour of St Peter and St Paul, founded here by William the Conqueror, was, by the earl of Moreton, in the reign of Henry I., amply endowed and bestowed on the monks of Cluny; its revenue at the dissolution was estimated at £524 11s. 8d., Distance from Yeovil, 4½ m. W.N.W. Pop., in 1801, 227; in 1831, 1028. A. P., £4,735.

MONTFORD, a parish in Pimhill hundred, co. of Salop. Living, a discharged vicarage in the archd. of Salop and dio. of Lichfield and Coventry, rated at £4 18s. 6d. Church ded. to St Chad. Patron, in 1829, Earl Powis. Distance from Shrewsbury, 5 m. W.N.W. Pop., in 1801, 456; in 1831, 566. A. P., £3,462.

MONTGOMERYSHIRE,

One of the six counties of North Wales; bounded on the north by Denbigh; on the north-east and east by Salop; on the south and south-east by Radnor; on the west and south-west by Cardigan; and on the west by Merioneth. Its extreme length is about 35, and its extreme breadth about 30 miles. It is supposed to contain 500,000 acres, of which 240,000 are supposed to be in a course of cultivation, 60,000 being annually under tillage. The surface and soil of this county is considerably diversified, but upon the whole bleak and mountainous. In a general view of the eastern part of the co. the Buddin hills form a striking feature; towards the west and north the Berwyn range rises upwards of 2000 feet; and towards the south-west, bordering with Cardiganshire, Plinlimmon rises 2463 feet, while the table land occupying the centre generally averages 1000 feet above the level of the sea. It has at the same time, perhaps, a greater proportion of fertile plains and rich vales than almost any other of the Welsh counties, and the hills, though less picturesque than those of some of the other counties, are more valuable, being for the most part clothed with verdure to their summits. The more favoured and fertile spots lie chiefly in the southern and eastern parts of the county, which are intersected by the Severn and its numerous tributary streams. The principal river of the county is the Severn, which, rising on Plinlimmon in the south-west corner of the co., holds a winding course towards the north-east, receiving numerous accessions in its progress, and watering the towns of Llanidloes, Newton, and Pool, enters Salop near Melverley. The Fyrwy is another very considerable river, that, having its sources in the west of the county, with its numerous tributaries adorns and fertilizes many a delightfully sequestered vale. It receives, a little below Llanasintffraid, the Tanat from the north, and shortly after falls into the Severn. On the west side of the county numerous rivulets take a westerly direction, and falling into the river Dyfi, which forms the boundary between Montgomery and Merioneth, are along with it poured into the Irish sea at Aberdovey. Salmon and trout are abundant in all these rivers and rivulets, especially in the Fyrwy, which is accounted the best trouting stream in North Wales. Agriculture is here in a state of great forwardness. Clean farming is highly appreciated, and to the crops common in the other counties belonging to the principality are added very generally peas, vetches, turnips, and hemp. Few cattle are fattened in the county, stores being supposed to pay better. The native breed of cattle are brindled, short-legged, and deep in the carcass. The Devonshire breed has been introduced, and of late the Herefordshire, which is preferred to all others. There are two kinds of sheep common to the county, the one in request for its wool, and the other, which is black-faced, for the excellence of its mutton. The Welsh pony, celebrated for its hardihood, strength, and sureness of foot, is found here in its unsophisticated condition. The sheep, however, form the principal riches of the county, the mountains being wholly occupied as sheep walks. The flocks during the summer months, like those of Spain, are driven to feed at a great distance, and the farms in the valleys are mostly held as appendages for winter habitations, and for raising provisions and fodder. From the native wool flannels and coarse cloths are manufactured. The greater part of the flannels in the English market are supplied by this county. Cattle, butter, and cheese, are also exported in considerable quantities. The oak of the county is in high repute for ship-building, and it yields very considerable quantities, vast plantations of oak being formed by the landed proprietors to meet the increasing demand. The county is also rich in minerals, especially lead and copper. Excellent slates are dug near the confluence of the Fyrwy and the Severn, immense quantities being regularly shipped for Bristol. The county is in the dioceses of St Asaph, Bangor, and Hereford, provinces of Canterbury, containing 47 parishes. It is divided into 9 hundreds, and has 7 market towns, one of them being a borough. It sends one member to parliament. The assizes are held at Welshpool, the quarter sessions at Montgomery. Pop., in 1801, 49,978; in 1831, 65,700. A. P., £207,286.

MONTGOMERY, a borough, market town, and parish, in the hundred of Montgomery, co. of Montgomery. Living, a rectory in the archd. and dio. of Hereford, rated at £17 4s. 4½d. Patron, the king. The town is situated on the east bank of the Severn, on an eminence commanding an extensive prospect of the vale of Montgomery. The streets are steep, and the houses generally built of brick. Having neither trade, manufactures, nor any thoroughfare, few country towns can be found more inanimate or more perfectly retired. It is governed by a high steward, two bailiffs, and 12 burgesses, and with Llanidloes, Welshpool, Machynllaeth, Llanfyllin, and Newton, sends one member to parliament. The market day is Thursday. The fairs are March 3d, June 20th, September 4th, and November 11th. The castle of Montgomery, once a place of great strength, is now a mass of ruins. Here is a dissenting chapel, and a charity school with a handsome endowment. Distance from London, 168 m. N.W. Pop., in 1801, 972; in 1831, 1188. A. P., £5,236.

Patron, in 1829, Lord Courtenay. The town is situated on a gentle eminence near the verge of Dartmoor, and is nearly surrounded by lofty hills whose barren heights form a striking contrast with the richly cultivated slopes, by which its immediate vicinity is distinguished. The woollen trade, at one time extensively prosecuted here, is now confined to the making of a few blankets and stockings, besides which there are some tan-yards and a rope work. The market day is Saturday, and Whitsun-Eve and the first Saturday in October are great cattle-markets. Fairs, chiefly for cattle, are held the 3d Thursday in July and the last Thursday in November. A portreeve is elected annually at the court-leet of the lord of the manor. There are places of worship for the Independents, the Wesleyan Methodists, and the Unitarians. Here is a small bequest for educating ten poor children. Distance from Exeter, 11 m. W.S.W. Pop., in 1801, 1768; in 1831, 1864. A. P., £6,446.

Living, a rectory with Ulgham, annexed in the archd. of Northumberland and dio. of Durham, rated at £32 16s. 8d. Church—a plain structure—ded. to St Mary. Patron, in 1829, earl of Carlisle. The town of Morpeth is pleasantly situated in the centre of a richly cultivated district on the north bank of the Wansbeck, over which it has two bridges; one ancient, having two arches, and one modern, having three. It consists principally of one long street, in the line of the great road leading to Edinburgh, in the centre of which is the market-place, conveniently situated, but scarcely large enough for the immense droves of cattle which are driven here for sale. The market-day is Wednesday. Wednesday before Whitsuntide, and Wednesday before the 22d of July, are fairs; and there is a statute fair the Wednesday before Martin-masday for hiring servants. Races are held on Cottingwood, to the north of the town, annually in the month of September. There is an extensive colliery in the neighbourhood, and there are in the town manufactories for flannel and carpets, large tan-yards, and extensive breweries. Morpeth is a borough by prescription, and, since the reign of Queen Mary, sent two members to parliament, until the reform bill reduced the representation to one. The number of electors is about 450. The officers of the corporation are two bailiffs, a sergeant-at-mace, two ale-tasters and bread-weighers, two fish and flesh lookers, four constables, and free burgesses, sometimes more and sometimes less numerous. The county magistrates hold a petty session for the borough the first Wednesday of every month. The town-hall is a plain structure of hewn stone, with a piazza and turrets erected by the Howards in 1714. It is appropriated to meetings upon public business, and the under part is used occasionally as a theatre. A commodious gaol for the county, with sessions-house and offices, at the estimated expense of £80,000. Besides the established church, there is here a chapel-of-ease, with places of worship for the Independents, the Primitive and Wesleyan Methodists, the Presbyterians, and the Roman Catholics. The free grammar school, founded by Edward VI., has an endowment of £240 per annum, and an English free school is supported by the corporation. William Turner, M.D., the earliest English writer upon botany, who died in 1568, was a native of this place, as is Dr R. Morrison the Chinese linguist and missionary. Distance from London, 289 m. N. NEWCASTLE-UPON-TYNE,

The county-town of Northumberland, 273 m. N.N.W. from London, and 117 m. S.E. of Edinburgh, on the northern bank of the Tyne, 8½ m. W. from the confluence of that river with the ocean. Its geographical position is in 54° 58' 30" N. lat., and 1° 17' 30" W. long. Pop., in 1801, 28,366; in 1831, 42,760. A. P., £91,640.

Description, Trade, &c.—The town of Newcastle extends 2 m. along the banks of the Tyne, and 1 m. from the river side, in the direction of N. and N.W. Most of the ancient streets are narrow and irregular, but great improvements have been made, particularly in the N. and N.W. districts. The mansion-house, in which the mayor resides, was erected in 1691. The trinity-house, guild-hall, common gaol, town-court, and exchange, are all substantial and commodious edifices. The barracks occupy a space of 11 acres. The quay is a spacious area, S.E. of the exchange, forming a line of wharfage 541 yards in length; it is accessible for vessels of 300 or 400 tons burden. The chief exports are coal, lead, glass, earthenware, &c. The coal trade gives employment to about 75,000 persons; its weekly produce has been estimated at £60,000, and the duty at £600,000 per ann. Newcastle trades with the south of Europe, with Norway and the Baltic, and with Davis' Straits. In 1827, the number of ships registered at the Newcastle custom-house was 862, and their aggregate burthen 186,500 tons. The amount of customs received at the port average about £350,000 annually; but of this a large proportion consists of the excise on imported spirits. The port-dues, paid to the corporation as conservators of the Tyne, amounted, in 1826, to £7,105 18s. 7d. The manufactories are numerous and extensive, including beer, earthenware, ropes, paper, glass, soap, glue, lead, &c. About two-fifths of the English glass is made in the district of the Tyne. The markets are on Monday and Tuesday. Fairs, Aug. 12th and following 9 days, Oct 29th and 9 days, and Nov. 22d.

Ecclesiastical Affairs.—The whole of the town and county of Newcastle is situated in St Nicholas parish; but part of the parochial chapelries of All Saints, St Andrew's, and St John's, form the parochial diocese. The living of St Nicholas is a vicarage, rated at £50. Patron, the bishop of Carlisle.—All Saints is a perpetual curacy, endowed with £2,200.—St Andrew's is a perpetual curacy, endowed with £2,800.—St John's is a perpetual curacy, endowed with £2,400. These three are in the patronage of the vicar of St Nicholas. The churches—excepting All Saints—are very ancient structures. There are no fewer than 31 places of worship in this town, of which 24 belong to dissenters.

Schools, &c.—The free grammar school, founded in 1525 by T. Horsley, then mayor of Newcastle, and chartered by Queen Elizabeth, is under the patronage of the corporation. There are nine public schools for children of both sexes, two exclusively for girls, two for infants, and twenty-one Sunday schools. This town is graced by numerous charities. There is also a Literary and Philosophical society, a Botanical society, a mechanics' institution, a public library, and several circulating libraries.

Government and Franchise.—Newcastle was first incorporated by Henry II. It was exempted from the jurisdiction of the sheriffs of Northumberland by Henry VI. Its present charter, granted by James I., invests the government of the town in a mayor, recorder, sheriff, 10 aldermen, 24 common-councilmen, 24 electors, two coroners, a town-clerk, sword-bearer, clerk of the chamber, 8 chamberlains, a quaysmaster, and other officers. The corporation revenues, in 1829, amounted to £46,432. The mayor, recorder, and aldermen, are justices of the peace, and hold quarter-sessions for the borough and county of Newcastle. Mayors' courts are held every Monday for the trial of civil actions between freemen only. The under sheriff holds a county-court every fourth Wednesday. There is a court of requests for the recovery of small debts; and the county-azmises are holden here. The elective franchise was first exercised in the 23^d Edward I., since which time Newcastle has returned two members to parliament. The new electors are in number about 3500; the sheriff is the returning officer. The several townships of Byker, Heaton, Jesmond, Westgate, and Elswick, are now included within the boundaries of the borough.

History.—The ancient name of this place was Pons-Ælii, so called from a bridge erected by Adrian on his return from an expedition against the Picts, by whom this part of the island was frequently molested. It was subsequently called Moncaster, or Monkchester, and was one of the residences of the Northumbrian kings. It next fell into the hands of the Scots, from whom it was recovered by William, duke of Normandy, whose oldest son Robert built a fortress, which being called Newcastle, gave the town its present appellation. The castle still exists.

Living, a rectory in the peculiar jurisdiction of the archbishop of Canterbury, rated at £16. Patron, the bishop of Worcester. Church ded. to St Mary. Two district churches were lately erected, the livings of which are perpetual curacies, in the rector's patronage. The parochial, national, and Sunday schools, were united in 1820, and a spacious building erected for their use; the number of children on the establishment is about 700; and there are several other schools for the education of the poor. The Drapers' and the Fishmongers' almshouses are built on a handsome and commodious plan. There are some ancient buildings, but the village has been much extended by ranges of modern houses. The Dover and the Brighton roads diverge from a point close to the Elephant and Castle, where the number of coaches stopping and passing in a day has been estimated at 500. The adjunct Butts was given to the village at the time of butts, or marks, for the practice of archery, being set up by government previous to the general use of fire-arms. The Surrey asylum for the reception and support of discharged prisoners was instituted in 1824, and is fitted to accommodate 60 inmates. Here is an extensive manufactory for floor-cloth, and another for upholstery; and within the walls of the parish workhouse twine, rope, and door-mats are made. Pop., in 1801, including the hamlet of Walworth, 14,847; in 1831, 44,626. A. P., £84,223.

NEWINGTON-GREEN, a village partly in Stoke-Newington and partly in Islington parish, Finsbury division of Ossulston hundred, co. of Middlesex, 2 m. north from London. It consists of irregularly built ranges of houses forming a square, in the centre of which is an area covered with green sward, from whence it may be supposed the name is derived. On the north side is a Unitarian chapel, in which the celebrated Dr Price and Dr Towers officiated for many years.

NEWINGTON (NORTH), a hamlet in Broughton parish, Oxfordshire, 2½ m. W. by S. from Banbury. Pop., in 1801, 262; in 1831, 318.

NEWINGTON (SOUTH), a parish in Wootton hundred, Oxfordshire, 4½ m. W.N. W. from Deddington. Living, a discharged vicarage in the archd. and dio. of Oxford, rated at £8, and returned at £109. Patron, Exeter college, Oxford. Church ded. to St Peter. Pop., in 1801, 395; in 1831, 462. A. P., £2,631.

NEWINGTON (STOKE), a village and parish in Finsbury division of Ossulston hundred, Middlesex, 4 m. N. by E. from London, between Islington and Hornsey. Living, a rectory rated at £10, in the peculiar jurisdiction of the dean of St Paul's, and in the patronage of the prebendary of Stoke-Newington. Church ded. to St Mary. The village, consisting of one long street, extends from Kingsland road to Stafford hill, and is the high road from London to Cambridge. There are several elegant detached houses, among which the ancient manorial residence is worthy of notice. The land about here is chiefly occupied by dairy-men, nursery-men, and market-gardeners. The trade of the place depends on the inhabitants, and its position as a great thoroughfare. On the eastern side of the village is a district church, also two places of worship for Dissenters. There are three extensive charity schools, an invalid asylum erected in 1825 for respectable females, a dispensary and a savings' bank. This place has been honoured by the residence of several eminent individuals, among whom we may mention Thomas Sutton, the founder of the charter-house; D. De Foe, author of Robinson Crusoe; Dr Isaac Watts, J. Howard the philanthropist; Dr Aikin, and the eccentric Thomas Day. Pop., in 1801, 1462; in 1831, 3480. A. P., in 1815, £12,429; in 1828, £19,200.

NEWKIRK, a hamlet in Greystock parish, Cumberlandshire, a short distance from Carlisle.

Patron, the bishop of Exeter. Here is a small endowed school. Several chalybeate springs have been discovered in this parish. Here is also a valuable lead-mine. Petty sessions are held in the village once a month, and fairs the first Tuesday in October and the 8th of November. Formerly the bishops of Exeter had a palace here. Pop., in 1801, 736; in 1831, 1218. A. P., £6,663.

NEWMARKET, a market town consisting chiefly of one long street, the north side of which is in Lackford hundred, Suffolk; the south side in Cheveley hundred, Cambridge. The earliest record we have of this town is dated 1227, when a market, recently established at Exming, in this neighbourhood, was transferred hither in consequence of the plague raging at that place. Its trade and commerce are chiefly dependent on the sporting meetings held seven times a year. The race-course and training grounds are considered superior to any in the kingdom. James I. erected a hunting-seat here, which was rebuilt by Charles II., who was a great patronizer of the turf, and a constant visitor to the Newmarket races. In March 1683, when this monarch and several members of the royal family had assembled to witness the races, a tremendous fire broke out, which consumed a great part of the town. It has been supposed that the defeat of the Rye-house plot may be attributed to this accident, as it occasioned the company to depart at a different hour to that calculated upon by the conspirators. Newmarket comprises the parishes of St Mary and All Saints, both in the archd. of Sudbury and dio. of Norwich. The living of St Mary's is a discharged rectory with Wood-Diton vicarage, rated at £4 15s. 2½d. Patron, the duke of Rutland. All Saints is a perpetual curacy, endowed with £400. Patron, the bishop of Norwich. Here are two free schools endowed by Queen Anne; also a national school. The market, granted in 1227, is held on Tuesday. Fairs on Whit-Tuesday and November 8th. Petty sessions are held here every Tuesday, and a court-leet occasionally. Pop. of All Saints, in 1801, 485; in 1831, 714. A. P., £2,342.—Pop. of St

Mary, in 1801, 1307; in 1831, 2134. A. P. £3,836.

NEWMARKET, a parish in Prestelgne hundred, Flintshire, N.W., $3\frac{1}{2}$ m. N. from St Asaph. Living, a perpetual curacy in the archd. and dio. of St Asaph. A free school was founded here in 1726. A market is held on Saturday, and fairs last Saturday in April, 3d Saturday in July, 4th Saturday in October, and 2d Saturday in December. Pop., in 1801, 451; in 1831, 631. A. P., £1,289.

NEW-MILLS, a hamlet in Stroud parish, Gloucestershire.

NEW-MILLS, a manufacturing district in Glossop parish, Derbyshire, 10 m. N. from Chapel-en-le-Frith. It was anciently called Bowden-Middle-Cale, and comprised seven hamlets, at which time the chief manufactures were paper and cloth, but these have given place to calico-printing and bleaching-works. The calico engraving establishment of Messrs Potts & Co. is the most extensive one in the kingdom. The commissioners for building churches have granted £2,500 towards erecting a new church. The living will be a perpetual curacy in the archd. of Derby and dio. of Lichfield and Coventry. Patron, the vicar of Glossop. Here is a small endowed school. Pop., in 1801, 1878; in 1831, 3238. A. P., £7,603.

NEWMINSTER-ABBEY, a township in Morpeth parish, Northumberland, $\frac{1}{2}$ m. W. from Morpeth; the site of a magnificent monastery, the gate of which is still remaining. Pop., in 1801, 57; in 1831, 121.

NEWPORT, a hundred at the northern extremity of Buckinghamshire, containing 46 parishes, including the towns of Newport-Pagnell and Olney.

NEWPORT, a small borough in St Stephen's parish, Cornwall, adjacent to Launceston, with which it was originally joined in parliamentary representation under the name of Dunheved, but by Edward VI. it was privileged to send two members for itself. The reform bill, by placing Newport in schedule A, has deprived it, or rather its lord, of this privilege. The duke of Northumberland is lord of the manor and sole proprietor. Living, a perpetual curacy annexed to St Stephen's vicarage, in the archd. of Cornwall and dio. of Exeter.

Church ded. to St Thomas. Pop., including that of the parish, in 1801, 738; in 1831, 1084. A. P., £3,467.

NEWPORT, a parish in Uttlesford hundred, Essex, 3½ m. S.S.W. from Saffron-Walden. Living, a discharged vicarage in the archd. of Colchester and dio. of London, rated at £9 10s. Patron, the lord-chancellor. Church ded. to St Mary. Here is a free grammar-school founded in 1586: its income is nearly £200. Fairs are held on Easter Tuesday and November 17th. Pop., in 1801, 663; in 1831, 914. A. P., £2,603.

NEWPORT, a borough, market-town, and sea-port in Wentloog hundred, Monmouthshire, 24 m. S.W. from Monmouth, and 147½ m. W. from London. A charter was granted by Edward II., and confirmed by succeeding monarchs, vesting the government of the town in a mayor, high steward, twelve aldermen, and a recorder,—the mayor and senior aldermen acting as magistrates. One member is returned to parliament from this town, in conjunction with Monmouth and Usk. Newport town is agreeably situated on the river Usk, about 4 m. above its entrance into the Bristol channel. The streets are well-paved and lighted with gas; most of the houses are modern, and there are several handsome buildings in progress. The market is on Saturday. Fairs on Holy Thursday, Whit-Thursday, August 15th, and November 6th. Coal and iron and tin-plate are the principal articles of export; they are shipped hence for Bristol, Ireland, the Mediterranean, and America. The imports consist of provisions and other articles of consumption. The number of vessels which entered inwards in 1826, was 15 British and 12 foreign; of those cleared out, 52 British, and 22 foreign. Ship-building is carried on to a considerable extent, and besides iron-founderies, here are breweries, rope-walks, and potteries. Over the river Usk is a handsome stone-bridge of 5 arches, near to which are the remains of a fortress, supposed to have been erected by Robert, earl of Gloucester, natural son of Henry I., who, in right of his wife, the heiress of a Norman baron, had extensive possessions in this part of the county. The living of St Woollos parish, in which Newport is situated, is a discharged vicarage in the archd. and dio. of Llandaff, rated at £7 3s. 11½d., and returned at £81. Patron, the bishop of Gloucester. Church ded. to St Gualas or Woollos. A seaman's chapel has been erected in the vicinity. Here are several good free schools. Pop. with Newport, in 1801, 1423; in 1831, 7062. A. P., £11,990.

NEWPORT, a market-town and parish in Newport division of South Bradford hundred, Shropshire, 19 m. E.N.E. from Shrewsbury, and 139 m. N.W. by N. from London. The market is on Saturday. Fairs, 1st Tuesday in Feb.; Saturday before Palm-Sunday; May 23th; July 25th; Sep. 25th, and Dec. 10th. Living, a perpetual curacy in the archd. of Salop and dio. of Lichfield and Coventry.

Patron, the lord-chancellor. The church, ded. to St Nicholas, was made collegiate by T. Draper, a citizen of London, in the reign of Henry VI. Here is a good free school built and endowed by W. Adams, who also founded almshouses for four persons, and made several charitable bequests to this parish. The inmates of the almshouses receive a weekly pension. Pop. of Newport, in 1801, 2307; in 1831, 2746. A. P., £4,396.

NEWPORT, a borough, market-town, and parish, having separate jurisdiction, but locally situated in the south-west half hundred of West Medina liberty, Isle of Wight, co. of Southampton, 17 m. S.S.E. from Southampton, and 91 m. S.W. from London. Its first charter was granted by James I., but that under which it is now governed was obtained from Charles II., and vests the government in a mayor, 11 aldermen, and 12 burgesses; the mayor and burgesses having power to hold a court of record every week. Since the 23^d of Edward I., this borough has enjoyed the privilege of sending two members to parliament; the right of election is enjoyed by 445 electors. The mayor is the returning officer.—The town consists of five parallel streets, crossed by three others at right angles, all well paved and lighted. There are several handsome shops, good inns, a theatre, and spacious town-hall, under which is the market-house. The manufacture of thread-lace gives employment to a considerable number of persons. Timber, iron, and malt, are the chief articles of commerce. Large quantities of wheat and flour are exported. The market for corn and provisions is on Saturday. A cattle market every alternate Wednesday. Fairs, Whit-Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday.—Living, a perpetual curacy annexed to Carisbrooke vicarage, in the archd. and dio. of Winchester. Patron, the vicar of Carisbrooke. Church ded. to St Thomas à Becket. The burial ground was appropriated to this church in Queen Elizabeth's reign, when the plague was raging at Carisbrooke. Here are places of worship for Dissenters, and a Roman Catholic chapel, a free grammar school, a national school, and several Sunday schools. An almshouse for five persons was founded in 1618, pursuant to the will of G. Kent; and another, by some unknown benefactor, for four families. About 1 m. southward, are the house of industry, the park-barracks, and military hospital, with accommodation for 3000 soldiers.—Pop. of Newport, in 1801, 3585; in 1831, 4081. A. P., £9,392.

NEWPORT-PAGNELL, a market-town and parish in Newport hundred, Buckinghamshire, 15 m. N.E. by E. from Buckingham, and 50½ m. N.W. from London. It stands on the banks of the Ouse, over which there is a fine stone bridge.—This town derives its adjunct from the Pagnell family, who became proprietors of the manor as descendants of W. Fitzauself, a Norman baron. It is one of the largest towns in the county, well built, but badly paved and lighted. Water is supplied to the houses by means of an hydraulic machine. The chief support of the poorer inhabitants depends on the manufacture of lace, which is carried on to a great extent, and for which a market is held every Wednesday. The general market is on Saturday. Fairs, Feb. 22d, April 22d, June 22d, Aug. 28th, Oct. 22d, and Dec. 22d. The petty-sessions for the hundred are holden here.—Living, a discharged vicarage in the archd. of Buckingham and dio. of Lincoln, rated at £10, returned at £137 9s. 8d. Patron, the lord-chancellor. NORFOLK,

A maritime county so encompassed by sea and by rivers, that it might be designated a peninsula, as it is joined to the mainland only by a narrow causeway. It is bounded on the N. and N.E. by the German ocean; S. and S.E. by Suffolk; and on the W. by the Lincolnshire Washes and part of Cambridgeshire. Its extreme length, 70 m. E. to W.; greatest breadth, 40 m. from N. to S.; and the circumference 170 m. It comprehends an area of 2092 square miles, or 1,338,880 statute acres.

Name and History.—The name is but slightly altered from the original, North-folk, a term used by the Saxons to distinguish the inhabitants of the north from those of the south. It was anciently inhabited by a tribe of the Iceni, and subsequently became a part of the East Saxon kingdom under Uffa, about the year 575, who united the counties of Norfolk, Suffolk, and Cambridge, under the title of the kingdom of East Anglia. In the reign of Egbert, this county suffered greatly from the barbarous devastations committed by the Danes, who continued their invasions almost without interruption, till subdued by the Saxons under Alfred the Great, in 878, who limited their residence to the eastern part of England, under their own chiefs, nominally subject to the government of the Anglo-Saxons. Many severe contests between the Saxons and the Danes occurred here at different times. Sweyn, king of Denmark, to revenge the horrid massacre of the Danes by King Ethelred II., landed on the coast of Norfolk in 1003, and burned the flourishing cities of Thetford and Norwich, but was compelled to re-embark. In 1010 he returned with his troops, and landing at Ipswich, took possession of East Anglia, which was subsequently allotted to his son Canute, upon the division of the kingdom between him and Edmund Ironside. After the Norman conquest, Norfolk was held as an earldom by Ralph de Guader, which title, in Stephen's reign, was conferred on the family of Bigod; one of whom took the lead in a conspiracy against Edward I. The title is now enjoyed by the Howards, descendants of the Mowbrays. In Wat Tyler's rebellion, the insurgents were joined by several of the lower order in this county, headed by a dyer named Lister, but were defeated by Spencer, bishop of Norwich, and their leader was executed in London. During the civil wars of Charles I., Norfolk joined the parliamentarians, and Norwich was fortified against the king.

Divisions, &c.—Norfolk is divided into 33 hundreds, 4 boroughs, and 28 market-towns. The hundreds are Blofield, Brothercross, Clackclose, Clavering, Depwade, Diss, Earsham, North and South Erpingham, Eynsford, East and West Flegg, Forehoe, Freebridge-Lynn and Marshland divisions, Gallow, North and South Greenhoe, Grimshoe, Giltcross, Happing, Henstead, Holt, Humbleyard, Launditch, Loddon, Mitford, Shropham, Smithdon, Taverham, Tunstead, Walsham, and Wayland. The boroughs are Lynn-Regis, Castle-Rising, Thetford, and Yarmouth. The market-towns, Aylesham, Attlebury, Buckenham, Burnham, Caister, Clay, East Dereham, Diss, Downham, Fakenham, Foulsham, Harleston, East Harling, Heckling, Hingham, Holt, Loddon, Methwold, Reepham, Setching, Snettisham, Swaffham, Walsham, Walsingham, Watton, Windham, and Worstead. It contains likewise one city—Norwich—where the quarter-sessions are held alternately with Thetford. There are 154 acting magistrates. Four members are returned for the county, two for the E. and two for the W. division.—Besides many places having separate jurisdiction, there are various courts possessing peculiar privileges; the principal of these are the court of the liberty of the duchy of Lancaster, held at Aylesham, and the court of the liberty of the duchy of Norfolk, held at Lapham, or any other place within the liberty, at the option of the duke of Norfolk, who is lord of the liberty, and appoints a steward and other officers.—The marine department of civil government is vested in the vice-admiral of Norfolk, who has power to hold a court of admiralty for the county, assisted by various officers.

Rivers, &c.—The principal rivers are the Great and Little Ouse, the Waveney, the Yare, the Wensum, the Bure, the Nar, and the Nen.—The Great Ouse, rising in Huntingdonshire, passes through Cambridgeshire, and forming a part of the S.W. boundary of Norfolk, flows in a northern direction to the sea, below Lynn.—The Little Ouse rises about the middle of the Suffolk border, and flowing westward, joins the Great Ouse near Downham.—The Waveney has its source near that of the Little Ouse, and running eastward, bounds the county on the S., and falls into the sea near Yarmouth.—The Yare, rising near Attleborough and flowing towards Norwich, is joined by the Wensum and other small streams.—The Wensum has its source near West Rudham, and flowing S.E. is met by the Waveney near Burgh.—The Bure rises on the north side of the county, and joins the Yare near Yarmouth.—The Nar, sometimes called the Secahy, rises at Litcham, and flows eastward to Narborough, where it unites with the Great Ouse.—The Nen skirts the western boundary of the county.—These rivers, passing through a level country, are consequently but slow in their progress, sometimes forming shallow lakes or broads, which are abundantly stocked with fish and waterfowl. To improve the navigation of the river Nen, there is a canal from Wisbeach in Cambridgeshire, to Outwell creek and Salters-Load in Norfolk, and one called Ease-brink-cut, to Lynn and Regis, was completed in 1820. All the principal modern roads crossing this county meet at Norwich.

Face and Soil of the County.—The general aspect of Norfolk is more uniform than that of most places equally extensive in England, being nearly level, except in the vicinity of Norwich and Sherringham.—With regard to soil, this county exhibits a great variety. In the west is a large tract of flat fenny land; in the east, near Yarmouth, a narrow line of marshes, consisting of sand and clay, extends a considerable distance up the country; in the north-east is a light sandy loam, particularly adapted for tillage. The more central parts are very fertile. The sea-coast is formed chiefly of clayey cliffs, or low sandy shores along which sand-hills have been raised to protect the country from inundation. Within some of these banks are extensive salt-marshes, frequently overflowed by the tides. Northwards, the coast is indented by narrow creeks and inlets, only fit for small vessels. The navigation is rendered very hazardous by the numerous shoals and banks extending far out to sea. Of these the most dangerous are on a line with the coast of Yarmouth, forming the celebrated Yarmouth roads.

Agriculture, &c.—The agricultural produce of this county varies with the soil and situation. Wheat, barley, pease, beans, mustard, hemp, and saffron, are all cultivated; but the county is most distinguished for its growth of turnips, considered superior to those in any other part of the kingdom. The fenny districts afford excellent pasture for milch kine. Scottish and other cattle are fattened for market; and the Norfolk sheep are valuable, their neck wool being considered equal to Spanish fleece. A singular custom exists here respecting the grazing of sheep, which is, that the lord, as he is termed, of every township, orders how many and what kind of sheep the people shall have, where the walks shall be fixed, where the sheep shall be folded, and how driven. The horses are remarkably strong and active.

Trade and Manufactures.—The trade of Norfolk consists principally in the exportation of its own manufactured goods, the importation of foreign articles, and supply the adjacent counties as well as the metropolis with poultry of all kinds. There are extensive herring and mackerel fisheries. The chief manufactures are those of stuffs, silk, cambrics, and calicoes. The town of Worstead is famous for a peculiar sort of woollen goods.

Ecclesiastical Affairs.—Norfolk is in the dio. of Norwich and province of Canterbury, comprising the archdeaconries of Norfolk and Norwich, the number of parishes being greater here than in any other county in England. The churches are correspondingly numerous, but few of them possess much grandeur of architecture. There are some vestiges of ancient monasteries and castles, also several remarkable old mansions.

Population.—The number of inhabitants in 1801 was 273,371; in 1831, 390,000. A. P., £1,540,952.

NORTHAMPTONSHIRE,

An inland county, bounded on the N. by the counties of Leicester, Rutland, and Lincoln, with the rivers Lesser Avon and Welland; on the E. by the counties of Cambridge, Huntingdon, and Bedford; on the S. by that of Buckingham and part of Oxford; and on the W. by the county of Warwick, and another portion of Oxford. It extends 60 miles from N.E. to S.W., and 20 miles from E. to W., comprising 965 square miles, or 617,000 statute acres; but, according to some, 1017 square miles, or 650,880 acres.

Divisions.—This county is divided into 20 hundreds; Nassaburgh, (or Peterborough liberty,) Willybrook, Corby, Polebrook, Navisford, Huxloe, Rothwell, Guilsborough, Orillingbury, Higham Ferrers, Spelhoe, Harnfordshoe, Nobottle Grove, Fawley, Chipping-Warden, Green's-Norton, Towcester, Wynaerale, Clely, and King's-Sutton. It has one city, viz., Peterborough, three boroughs, Northampton, Brackley, and Higham-Ferrers, and 10 market-towns, Daventry, Kettering, Oundle, Thrapstone, Towcester, Wellington, Fotheringhay, Long-Buckby, Rothwell and Weldon; but the last four are discontinued. Four members are returned for the county, two for the northern, and two for the southern division. Pop., in 1801, 131,757; in 1831, 179,800. A. P., £942,162.

Face of the Country.—The general aspect of this county exhibits a pleasing and interesting variety of vale and upland. The entire surface is peculiarly adapted for agriculture; yet as lately as the year 1818, a large proportion of this land was unenclosed. The ground is highest in the vicinity of Daventry, and around Towcester. The most fenmy district lies between Peterborough and Croyland. From these moderate degrees of height it is not subject to extremes of weather, and is considered one of the healthiest counties in England.

Soil and Agriculture.—The fertility of the various soils may be attributed to their depth, and to the porous nature of the stony substratum. A black or dark coloured soil extends over the whole of the western part. In the south, towards Towcester, it is a mixture of clay and gritstone. In the N.E. part of the county, it is of a light, thin description. Of the 617,000 acres of land, 290,000 are stated as arable, 235,000 pasture, and 86,000 otherwise appropriated, including meadow land and extensive woodlands; the latter may be arranged into four classes of forests, chases, park-woods, and woods and plantations. The most considerable forest is that of Rockingham on the N.W. side of the county. The principal trees are oak, ash, elm, and poplar. On the arable land of the open fields potatoes or turnips are sown the first year, wheat and barley the second, beans and oats the third. Wheat is cultivated in large quantities on the red soils. The average produce of oats is 42 bushels per acre. Rye occupies nearly 3000 acres, producing 32 bushels each. The farm lands are mostly devoted to grazing and fattening cattle. On the higher grounds great numbers of sheep are pastured.

Rivers, Canals.—All the principal rivers have their origin within the limits of the county; they are the Nene, Welland, Ouse, Charwell, Avon, and Leam. The most considerable of these is the Nene, one branch rising in Naseby, and another at Hartwell, near Staverton, both meeting at Northampton, and flowing in a north-eastern direction fall into the Wash, an inlet of the German ocean.—The Welland rises near Hothorpe, and separates the county from Leicester, Rutland, and Lincoln.—The Ouse has its source in a spring called Ousewell, in the southern part of the county.—The Charwell and the Leam rises near the source of the Nene; the first passes to Oxfordshire, the other to Warwickshire.—The canals in this county are of great importance. The Oxford canal passes along its western confines.—The Grand junction canal, commencing at Braunston, and passing through a tunnel in a south-eastern direction to Weedon, is there crossed by the great London road, and is navigable for barges of 60 tons.—The Union canal is the only other artificial navigation.

Chief Roads.—The road from London to Holyhead, through Buckingham and Shrewsbury, or through Birmingham, enters the county from Mixbury in Oxfordshire. The great mail-roads are generally level and wide; the turnpike roads also are kept in good repair, but the cross roads are much neglected.

Manufactures.—The principal articles of manufacture are woollen stuffs, shoes, lace, silk stockings, and whips. The chief imports are store-sheep, lean cattle, leather, coals, iron, and deals.

Courts, &c.—Northamptonshire has 79 acting magistrates. It is included in the midland circuit; the assizes are held at Northampton, where the quarter-sessions are held Jan. 14th, April 22d, July 15th, Oct 21st; and at Peterborough, Jan. 13th, April 21st, July 14th, and Oct. 20th.

Ecclesiastical Affairs.—This county is in the diocese of Peterborough and province of Canterbury, with the exception of Nasington and Gretton parishes—in the diocese of Lincoln—and King's-Sutton, a peculiar of the dean and chapter of Lincoln, in the diocese of Peterborough. It forms an archdeaconry, comprising 10 deaneries, viz. Daventry, Haddon, Higham-Ferrers, Northampton, Oundle, Peterborough, Preston, Rothwell, and Weldon.

History.—When Britain was invaded by the Romans, this part of the island was the territory of the Coritani; it was subsequently included in the Roman province—Flavia Cæsariensis—and by the Saxon in the kingdom of Mercia. This county has been the scene of many remarkable events. In 1460, the partisans of the houses of York and Lancaster had a desperate battle, in which the latter were victorious. Mary, Queen of Scots, was executed at Fotheringay castle in 1586; and in 1645, the army of Charles I. was defeated by Fairfax and Cromwell. The king was conveyed to Holdenby, or Holmby-house, in 1649, where he remained until seized by Cornet Joyce.

NORTHAMPTON, a borough, market, and county town of Northamptonshire, having separate jurisdiction, but locally situated in the hundred of Spelhoe, 65½ m. N.W. by N. from London, on the road to Leicester. It was first incorporated by Henry II., and is now governed under a charter granted 36th of George III., which vests the civil power in a mayor, recorder, 2 bailiffs, 4 aldermen, 12 magistrates, 48 common-councilmen, a town-clerk, chamberlain, and assistants. Quarter-sessions and a court of record are held by the corporation, but capital offences are transferred to the county assizes. This borough has returned two members to parliament from the time of Edward I.; the right of election is enjoyed by about 1100 persons. The mayor is the returning officer. It gives the title of earl to the family of Compton.

The market-days are Wednesday, Friday, and Saturday. Fairs are held Feb. 20th, for cattle and toys; April 6th, May 4th, June 19th, and Aug. 5th, for horses; Aug. 26th, a general fair; Sept. 19th, for cheese and sheep; 1st Thursday in Nov.—toll free—and Nov. 28th, and Dec. 19th, for all sorts of cattle.

This town comprises 4 parishes—All Saints, St Giles, St Peter, and St Sepulchre.—The living of All Saints is a rectory, rated at £22. Patrons, the corporation. The church has an elegant portico of the Ionic order.—St Giles, a vicarage, rated at £7 19s. Patron, in 1829, the Rev. E. Watkin. The church is situated at the east end of the town.—St Sepulchre, a vicarage, rated at £6 1s., returned at £86. The church is of a circular form, and supposed to have been built by the Knights Templars after the model of the holy sepulchre at Jerusalem.—St Peter's, a rectory, with the perpetual curacies of Upton and Kingthorpe, rated at £34 2s. 11d. Patrons, the governors of St Katherine's hospital, London. Here is a Roman Catholic chapel, and various places of worship for Dissenters.

Among the charitable institutions are Dryden's school, the corporation school, national, Lancasterian, and infant schools, besides the free grammar school founded in 1542. There are numerous and extensive bequests for charitable purposes.

The principal public buildings are the town-hall, an ancient and commodious structure, containing some valuable old paintings; the county-hall, a modern edifice in the Grecian style; the county-gaol, arranged on Howard's plan; the town gaol, and the theatre.—Races take place in September, and are well attended; the course, comprising about 117 acres, is at a short distance from the town. At the northern extremity of the town are handsome barracks, erected in 1796. And at the end of one of the principal streets a promenade has been made at the expense of the corporation.

The origin of this place is not certainly known, but some have conjectured that it was founded by the Anglo-Saxons, and was possessed by the Danes in the reign of Edward the Elder. During subsequent disturbances, the town was burnt by the military; about 50 years afterwards, when the Northumbrians marched against Tostig, son of Earl Godwin, the most dreadful outrages were committed, until an accommodation was entered into between the insurgents and Harold, who had been sent to oppose them. After the Norman conquest it had so far recovered from the consequences of these attacks, that it became the principal place of the county, and became the occasional residence of several of the kings of England. Henry I., in the 23d of his reign, celebrated Easter here with great pomp, and assembled a parliament, in which the English barons swore allegiance to the Empress Matilda as appointed successor to the throne. Henry II., in the 11th of his reign, convened a council at this place, before which Archbishop Becket was arraigned for refusing submission to the constitutions of Clarendon. On the rebellion of Prince Henry, Ankeil Mallore, one of his partizans, marching to Northampton with a body of forces, defeated the king's troops. In 1180, a convention of barons and prelates met here to consider the laws of the realm, and amend and enforce the constitutions of Clarendon, by which the kingdom was first divided in six circuits. Richard I., soon after his release from captivity, kept the festival of Easter here; on his death, the barons assembled in council at this place and took the oath of allegiance to his brother John, who, in the 10th of his reign, taking umbrage at the citizens of London, removed the court of exchequer to Northampton, and three years afterwards, assembled a council of temporal lords, which was attended by two of the pope's legates in behalf of the exiled clergy whom the king allowed to return to their country, but refusing to restore their confiscated property, he was excommunicated. Previous to the war between the king and the barons, the latter presented a memorial of their grievances, which the king refusing to redress, they laid siege to the castle, but were compelled to withdraw their forces; however, it was among the castles placed in their custody as security for the fulfilment of the conditions of Magna Charta. Henry III. kept Christmas at the castle with the governor; and in the 13th of his reign, gave ten marks towards a public library and the purchase of sacramental plate for the church of All Saints. In this reign an attempt was several times made to establish a university in the town, in consequence of disputes among the students of Oxford and Cambridge, a large party of whom retired to Northampton, and by royal licence established a new seminary, which was suppressed in 1265. The last parliament held here was in the 4th of Richard II. Pop. of this town, in 1801, 7020; in 1831, 15,351. A. P., £21,731.

NORTHUMBERLAND,

A maritime county in the north of England, bounded on the E. by the German ocean; on the S. by Durham and Cumberland; on the W. by Cumberland and Roxburghshire; and on the N. by a detached portion of Durham, which separates it from Berwick-upon-Tweed. Its length from N. to S. 70 m., and its extreme breadth from E. to W. 48 m.; including an area of 1850 square miles, or 1,157,760 acres.

Divisions, &c.—For purposes of civil government, this county is divided into 6 wards—Bambrough, Coquetdale, Glendale, Morpeth, Tindale, and Castle ward. The boroughs are Newcastle, Morpeth, and Berwick. The market-towns, Alledale, Alnwick, Belford, Bellingham, Blyth, Corbridge, Holtwhistle, Hexham, Rothbury, North Shields, Warkworth, and Wooler. Four members are returned to parliament for the county, viz. two for the N. and two for the S. division. It is included in the northern circuit; the assizes are held at Newcastle, Morpeth, Hexham, and Alnwick. The county-gaol is at Morpeth. There are 43 acting magistrates. Pop., in 1801, 157,101; in 1831, 223,000. A. P., £1,240,594.—The county of Northumberland is in the diocese of Durham, excepting the parishes of Alledale, Hexham, St John, Lee, and Throckington, which are in the diocese of York; it forms an archdeaconry in the province of York, and comprises 5 deaneries and 87 parishes.

Soil and Aspect.—The soil and surface of this county are very various; some parts are fertile and well-cultivated, while others are almost barren. On the sea-coast, and in the vales of Beamish, Till, and Beaumont, a sandy loam, or turnip soil, is found. Around the Cheviot hills, in the N. W., is a dry gravelly loam, affording good pasturage for sheep. Towards the centre and S. E. of the county, moist loams on a wet clayey bottom prevail, while a black peat earth occupies most of the mountainous districts and some of the lower parts of the country. The surface of this county is generally level about the sea-coast, it is more diversified towards the middle, rising into gently swelling ridges separated by the principal rivers; these districts are inclosed, and in a few places adorned with woods and plantations. The western side is open and mountainous, growing little else but heath, and affording only scanty subsistence to the flocks that are depastured there.

Climate.—The temperature is subject to great variations, and generally changes to extremes. The mountains are covered with snow for months together, when none is to be seen in the lower districts. A cold easterly wind is prevalent in the spring. Intense heat is suddenly succeeded by severe cold, accompanied with hail during summer and autumn. The winter has short frosts, but very heavy rains. Thunder storms are not very frequent, and notwithstanding its changeableness of climate, Northumberland is considered more healthful than most other maritime counties.

Agriculture.—The agricultural improvements made in this county within a few years, are scarcely to be equalled in any other part of the kingdom, and are in a great measure owing to the assiduity of the late Mr Bailey of Chillingham, who invented the swing-plough and many other useful machines. Wheat is grown in large quantities and in great varieties. Rye used to be the chief grain sown in all the sandy light soils, but since turnips and artificial grasses have been introduced, it is only cultivated in the most sandy soils. The barley crops are generally very abundant. Oats are grown all over the county. Beans have always been a flourishing crop, especially along the sea-coast. Pease are not so much cultivated as formerly. Numerous kinds of potatoes are grown. The corn harvest in the vale of Till and upon Tyneside frequently commences the first week in August, while in the bleak sterile districts, oats will often be uncut the beginning of November, but the most general harvest is in September. The hay harvest takes place in the middle of June.

Cattle.—The farmers of Northumberland have long been celebrated for their superior knowledge of breeding young cattle. Oxen are mostly grazed in the eastern part of the county and the vicinity of Whittingham. The long-wooled sheep have been much improved by the introduction of the Leicester sheep. Goats are kept on the Cheviot hills. The horses are strong and active, and generally of a middle size.

Rivers.—Few counties can boast of more noble rivers than Northumberland. The Tyne, Tweed, Blyth, Wansbeck, Coquet, and Aln, are all capable of receiving large vessels.—The Tyne has its source in two different parts of the country, and these two branches are termed the North and South Tyne; they meet near Hexham, and flowing westward fall into the sea at Tynemouth.—The Tweed, rising in a mountain in Tweeddale in Scotland, winds through a course of 30 miles, and skirts the northern border of this county.—The Blyth rises eastward of the course of the North Tyne, and discharges itself into the sea at Blyth.—The Wansbeck is formed by a number of small streams uniting before they reach Morpeth, and continuing an easterly course, fall into the sea at Cambola.—The Coquet rises among the Cheviot hills, and flowing eastward, empties itself into the sea below Warkworth.—The Aln takes its rise near the source of the last named river, and flowing in a circuitous direction, falls into the sea near Alemonth.—There are several lakes and cataracts, which add greatly to the beauty of the country.

Roads.—The roads are by no means good. The turnpikes are frequently carried over hills which might have been avoided, and their cross sections are injudiciously formed, and there is a great omission with respect to guide-posts.

Trade, Manufactures, and Commerce.—The coal-trade is the principal source of wealth in this county. The quantity of coal annually raised is immense. The entire surface of the coal measure has been calculated at 180 square miles, and the quality of the coal is unrivalled. Rich veins of lead-ore are worked in different parts of the county, and iron-ore is found both in the coal and lead districts. Lime-stone and free-stone, of various kinds, abound also. The principal manufactures are such as derive advantage from the collieries and mines, viz., glass-works, potteries, white-lead, coal-tar, &c. Ship-building and rope-making employ a great many individuals. The export trade is in coal, lead, glass, cast and wrought iron, colours and shot, flour, corn, oatmeal, butter, pickled salmon, potatoes, eggs, and other article of consumption. The chief imports are flax, hemp, masts, plank-timber, pitch, tar, skins, bark, brandy, rum and wines, oil, rags, linen-yarn, seeds, fruit, sugar and tobacco. Great variety of fish frequent the shores. The Tyne and the Tweed are noted for their valuable salmon fisheries, which form a very considerable branch of trade.

Buildings.—Among the elegant baronial residences which adorn Northumberland, Alnwick castle is one of the noblest. See article ALNWKICK. There are numerous vestiges of ancient castles in different parts of the county.

Antiquities.—The most important and remarkable of the many antiquities which have been discovered in this part of Britain, was the Picts' wall built by Severus. It extended from Solway Frith to the river Tyne, a distance of 68 miles. The height was 15 ft., the breadth 8 ft. On the north was a ditch 25 ft. wide and 15 ft. deep. Numerous stations and castles were constructed along the wall. The foundations of some of these are still visible. Near one of the stations the remains of a stone-bridge over the Tyne are visible.

History.—The aboriginal inhabitants, from the Tyne to the Frith of Forth, were called Otodini. Westward were the Gadeni, who submitted to the Romans under Julius Agricola. Both these tribes are supposed to have been dependent upon, or confederated with the Brigantes,—a numerous and powerful nation, whose territories included a great part of the island. They assumed the name of Meates, and in the reign of Antoninus Pius, became very formidable invaders of the Roman territories, until subdued by the emperor Severus, whose death happened in the year 210. Since which time, nothing very authentic has been related concerning the Britains, except in the year 306, when Constantine quelled the disorders in the northern frontiers. In the reigns of the succeeding emperors, the rampart was often broken through by the ferocious Picts, until Valentinian sent over a body of troops under the command of Theodosius, who repelled the invaders, and restored the empire. Valentinian was succeeded in the western empire by his son Gratian, who immediately invested Theodosius, son of the brave general mentioned above, with the command of the eastern provinces,—a dignity which was aspired to by Maximus, a Spaniard in the Roman service, and with which he was gratified by the soldiery. Gratian fell in opposing this presumptuous usurper. Theodosius died in 402. The final departure of the Romans from Britain was in A.D. 446. Civil discords ensued, the petty chiefs assembled to consult on the best means of repelling a threatened invasion by the Picts and Scots, and were persuaded by Vortigern to solicit assistance from the Saxons, who, taking advantage of the internal dissensions of the natives, aimed at the possession of the island, and ultimately obtained it, establishing their dominion in 547 under Ida, who assumed the title of king of Bernicia. He was succeeded in 593 by his grandson Ethelfrith, whose ambition led him to the invasion of Deira, and made him king of Northumbria. He was slain in a battle on the banks of the Idle, in Nottinghamshire, and Edwin, whose dominion in Deira he had usurped, was restored to the throne. The reign of this prince was distinguished by the introduction of Christianity into the north of England, and Edwin was now the greatest prince in the heptarchy, but was too ambitious to remain so. When driven from his throne by Ethelfrith, he was received and protected by the king of North Wales, whose son Cadwallon afterwards endeavoured to penetrate into Widdington, near Morpeth, for which encroachment Edwin chased him to Ireland. Cadwallon applied to Penda, king of Mercia, with whose assistance he defeated Edwin, who perished with his son in the battle. Penda, ever after this, evinced the greatest enmity to the Northumbrians of Bernicia. He was slain in 664 by Oswy, who died in 670, and was succeeded by his son Egfrid, by whose unsuccessful wars the kingdom was greatly diminished. He was succeeded on the throne by his illegitimate brother Alfred, who enjoyed a peaceful reign for 19 years. But from the time of his death in 705, until the kingdom became tributary to Egbert in 828, with the exception of Eadbert, it seems to have been a continued scene of anarchy and confusion. In 867, Northumberland was conquered by the Danes under Ivar, who assumed the government of the country between the Humber and the Tyne, beyond which Egbert still held the sceptre, until 876, when the conquest of the whole country was effected by Halfden, a Danish chief. The country was subsequently governed as a dependent kingdom, or as an earldom, till the Norman conquest, when hostilities commenced between England and Scotland, and which existed till the union of the two kingdoms.

NORTHWAY, a joint township with Newton in Ashchurch parish, Gloucestershire, $2\frac{1}{2}$ m. E.N.E. from Tewksbury. Pop., in 1801, 162; in 1831, 188. A. P., £2,851.

Patrons, the dean and chapter of Norwich.—St Paul and St James, a rectory and curacy, returned at £87. Patrons, the dean and chapter of Norwich.—All the above livings are in the archd. and dio. of Norwich. Many of the churches are worthy of particular notice, especially that of St Peter Mancroft. Norwich was made a bishop's see in 1094; the diocese comprehends Norfolk and Suffolk, with 16 parishes in Cambridgeshire. There are in all 1353 parishes of which 800 are in Norfolk, 537 in Suffolk, and 16 in Cambridge. The cathedral is one of the most ancient in England; its entire length from E. to W. is 411 feet, its breadth 71 feet, height of the tower and spire 315 feet. The places of worship for Dissenters are numerous; there are likewise two Roman Catholic chapels, and a Jews' synagogue.

Public Institutions.—The free grammar school, established by Edward VI., is endowed by the corporation of Norwich, who appoint the master and nominate the scholars. There are 12 charity schools supported by subscription. The national schools afford instruction to 1800 children, and several benevolent individuals have made large bequests for further promoting the interest of the children educated in these establishments.—Among other charitable institutions are the infirmary, dispensary, lunatic asylum, or Bethel's hospital, Magdalene society for relief of the indigent blind, Doughty's hospital, and several others.—Benefit societies have been formed for the aid of the widows of clergymen, surgeons, and decayed tradesmen.—There are also societies for the promotion of Christian knowledge, Bible and Missionary associations, &c.—The Norwich and Norfolk literary institution was founded in 1822; the philosophical society in 1812; the public subscription library in 1784; and the mechanics' institution in 1785.—One of the most important public buildings is the castle, in the centre of the town, though it belongs to the co. of Norfolk. On one side of it are public gardens. It is said to have been erected by Alfred on the site of one built by Offa, a Saxon king.—The new city-gaol, guild-hall, corn exchange, and shire-hall, are handsome and commodious edifices.

Municipal Government.—The government of this city, according to the charter confirmed by Charles II., is vested in a mayor, sheriffs, recorder, steward, 23 aldermen, 60 common-councilmen, a town-clerk, chamberlain, and inferior officers. The mayor is made justice of quorum for life, president of the court of mayoralty, and conservator of the peace of the city, county, and river. The recorder and steward must be barristers; they act as counsel for the city, and hold their offices for life. The city and county of Norwich assizes are held before the judges on the Norfolk summer circuit, distinct from those of Norfolk. The quarter-sessions are held in January, April, July, and October. A court of requests is held every Monday for recovery of debts under £2. This city has returned two members to parliament ever since the reign of Edward I. The electors are freeholders, 800; freemen, 2540; added by the reform bill, 2280; in all, 5620. The sheriffs are the returning officers.

Manufactures and Trade.—The chief articles of manufacture are bombazines, crapes, stuffs, camlets, and shawls; and there are several silk mills, iron-foundries, breweries, vinegar works, mustard mills, &c. The trade between Norwich and Yarmouth has been greatly facilitated by the establishment of steam-packets, and a navigable communication with the sea at Lowestoft in Suffolk. The markets are held on Wednesday, Friday, and Saturday. Fairs, day before Good-Friday, Easter-Monday and Tuesday, and Whit-Monday.

History.—This ancient city was originally connected with the Roman station Venta Jannona. Uffa, first king of East Anglia, built a castle here, in which he resided, and Norwich became the capital of his kingdom. The first historical notice of this place is in the Saxon chronicle, in the year 1004, when it was invaded by the Danes, who plundered and burnt the city, which was suffered to lie in ruins for several years. It was rebuilt by Canute in 1018, and became a place of considerable importance. In the reign of Edward I. it was encompassed by a strong wall at the expense of the citizens. In 1348 the plague broke out, and carried off 68,000 persons. In 1505 it was almost consumed by fire; but these calamities, dreadful as they were, had not so great an effect on the prosperity of Norwich as the formidable rebellion of Ket, in 1548, who was at length defeated by the earl of Warwick. Trade and commerce, however, were greatly revived by the politic measures of Queen Elizabeth's ministers, who afforded an asylum to the Flemings, when they were driven from the Netherlands by the duke of Alva: these emigrants restored and improved the silk and woolen manufactures.

NORWOOD, a precinct and parochial chapelry in Elthorne hundred, co. of Middlesex, $2\frac{1}{2}$ m. N. by W. from Hounslow. Living, a perpetual curacy, annexed to Hayes vicarage, in the exempt deanery of Croydon, endowed with £410. The society for building of churches granted £300 towards the enlargement of this chapel. NOTTINGHAMSHIRE,

An inland county bounded by Derbyshire on the west, Lincolnshire on the east, Leicestershire on the south, and Yorkshire on the north, extending 50 m. in length from E. to W., and 25 in breadth from N. to S. It is 110 m. in circumference, and contains 837 square miles. The pop., in 1801, was 140,350; in 1831, 225,400. A. P., £737,229.

Divisions.—It is divided into 6 wapentakes or hundreds, viz., Bassetlaw, Thurgarton, Newark, Broxtow, Bingham, and Rushcliffe, with the liberty of Southwell and Scrooby, and of Nottingham. The boroughs are, Nottingham, Newark, and East Retford. The market-towns, Bawtry, Bingham, Blyth, Mansfield, Ollerton, Southwell, Tuxford, and Worksop. It sends 10 members to parliament, viz., 4 for the county, 2 for each of the two first named boroughs, and 2 for East Retford and Bassetlaw.

Face and Soil of the Country.—The general aspect of this county is hilly, with the exception of one level part through which the river Trent runs. The soil consists principally of sand, or sand and gravel, clay and limestone. The crops usually cultivated are wheat, rye, barley, oats, beans, and pease. Hops form a considerable article in the produce of the Clay district, particularly in the vicinity of Retford. The average quantity is 6 cwt. per acre. A very large tract of meadow land has been improved by irrigation.

Cattle.—The horned cattle fed in this county are chiefly of Irish breed. The sheep are either the Dishley or the old forest breed, which has been much improved by crossing with that of Leicestershire, but this county is not so famous for the breed of any race of animals as for that of pigeons; greater numbers of them being kept here than in any other part of the kingdom.

Trade and Manufactures.—The trade of Nottingham is greatly facilitated by its canal navigation, which connects it with so many commercial districts. The exports are lead, coal, copper, salt, lime, stone, earthenware, oak-timber, cast-metal goods, &c. Its imports are timber, hemp, flax, iron, malt, corn, flour, and all kinds of raw materials for the inland manufactures. The chief manufactures are hosiery, glass, earthenware, tanned leather, silks, and lace.

Rivers.—The principal rivers are the Trent, the Erewash, the Soar, and the Idle, with some tributary streams. The Trent waters almost the whole extent of this county, and is navigable for large vessels as far as Gainsborough, and for barges during the whole of its course. The Soar forms the S.W. boundary, and is navigable for the Trent barges. The Erewash rises in Derbyshire, forms the western border of this county, and falls into the Trent near Attenborough. The Idle is formed by the union of several small streams, which form the central and N.W. parts of the county.

Canals and Roads.—The Nottingham canal, finished in 1822, passes south of the town, and taking a N.W. course of 15 miles, terminates in the Cromford canal near Langley bridge, and the Erewash canal. The Grantham canal proceeds in Holme-Pierrepont in an easterly direction to the Vale of Belvoir, and enters Leicestershire at the N.E. extremity. The Chesterfield canal enters the county on the N.W., and running eastward to Retford, turns northward to Drakelow. The whole extent of this canal is about 40 miles. The great North road from London to Edinburgh enters this county 3 m. S. of Newark. The road from London to Sheffield and Leeds, and the Leeds mail road, enter from Leicestershire. A good turnpike road branches off from the great Leeds road to Mansfield.

Forest of Sherwood.—This ancient forest is 25 miles in extent, and is the property of the crown. It originally comprised nearly the whole of the central and western parts of the county; but the greater part has been inclosed by royal grants obtained at various periods, and within its original boundaries are several villages and extensive parks. The principal remains of the ancient woods are the hays of Birkland and Bilbagh, on the N. of Ollerton and Edwinstow.

Ecclesiastical Affairs.—Nottinghamshire is in the diocese and province of York, and forms an archdeaconry, comprising the deaneries of Bingham, Newark, Nottingham, and Retford, which contains 205 parishes, of which 75 are rectories, 89 vicarages, and the rest, curacies, not in charge. Two synods of the clergy of Notts are held every year at Southwell.

Courts, &c.—This county is included in the midland circuit. The assizes are held at Nottingham on January 11th, April 19th, July 12th, and October 18th; at Newark on January 15th, April 23d, July 16th, and October 22d; at East Retford, January 18th, April 26th, July 19th, and October 25th. The county-gaol is at Nottingham, and the house of correction at Southwell. The county was under the same shrievalty with Derbyshire, until the reign of Elizabeth. There are 56 sitting magistrates.

History.—This portion of Britain was first inhabited by the Coritani, and included in the Flavia Cæsarensis of the Romans. On the establishment of the Saxon heptarchy it formed a part of the Mercian territory, and was subsequently held by the Danes, from whom it was delivered by Alfred, but falling again into their hands, it continued theirs until 941, when it was rescued by Edward the Elder. The central position of this county, and the great barrier formed by the river Trent, made it the scene of many important military movements during the English civil wars of the middle ages; and during the parliamentary war it was the seat of some most remarkable transactions. Here Charles erected his standard as signal of hostilities, and here that monarch surrendered himself to the commissioners from the Scottish army. During the French revolution of 1793, there was much political excitement in the county, and in 1812 and 1817, the manufacturing districts were much disturbed by the dissatisfaction of the labourers at the low rate of wages.

NOTTINGHAM,

A borough, market, and county-town in Broxtow hundred, co. of Nottingham, 124 m. N. N.W. from London. The first charter on record, granted to this town, was obtained from Henry II., the last from Henry VI., according to which the corporation consists of a mayor, recorder, two sheriffs, six aldermen, two chamberlains, twenty-four common-councilmen, a town-clerk, and other officers. The mayor and aldermen are justices of the peace in conjunction with the county magistrates. Two members are returned to parliament for this borough. The number of electors, according to the reform bill, appears to be 5191. The sheriffs are the returning officers. The corporation hold courts of session for the trial of all but capital offences. A court of record is held by the mayor and sheriffs once a fortnight for the recovery of debts to any amount. A monthly court for recovery of debts under £2 is held by the sheriffs, and courts leet and baron are held twice a year. Fairs for cattle and sheep are held, Friday in Midlent, May 14th, Whit-Tuesday, August 2d, and every alternate Wednesday. For horses, sheep, pigs, linen and woollen cloths, November 1st, and Monday before December 11th. The market is on Wednesday. The pop., in 1801, was 28,661; in 1831, 50,680. A. P., £42,336. —Nottingham is built on the acclivity of a rock of soft sand-stone, commanding a delightful view of the vale of Trent. On the N. is a chain of hills, and on the S. the vale of Belvoir. Many of the ancient streets are narrow, but there are several new and spacious ones. It is well-paved and lighted with gas, and has, upon the whole, an interesting appearance.

Public Buildings.—Among the public edifices are the town-hall, rebuilt in the reign of George I., and the bridewell, both spacious and commodious structures. The county-hall was erected in 1770, and comprises two law-courts and a grand jury-room, with a large prison behind it. The charitable institutions in this town are very numerous. The free grammar school is endowed with £500 per annum, and has on its foundation 100 scholars paying 10s. per annum. The blue coat, national, and Lancasterian schools are supported by subscription. There are several well-endowed hospitals or almshouses. The general hospital is open to invalids from any part of the country. The lunatic asylum is adapted for the reception of three classes of patients, such as can give full remuneration; those in indigent circumstances, who are admitted on low terms; and paupers, paid for by the county. Here is a public library, and several other literary institutions. Among the places of amusement are two assembly-rooms and a neat theatre. Races take place annually. The course at the N.E. end of the town is two miles in circumference. The cavalry barracks were erected in 1790.

Manufactures.—The staple manufactures are stockings, bobbin-net, and other kinds of lace. The trade in malt is very extensive. The ale brewed here is in high repute. No coal is dug within the liberties of this borough, but it is found in great abundance at a distance of 2 miles.

Ecclesiastical Divisions.—This town comprises three parishes, viz., St Mary, St Nicholas, and St Peter, in the archd. of Nottingham and dio. of York. There is also the extra-parochial liberty of St James. The living of St Mary's is a vicarage with the curacy of St Paul's, rated at £20 5s. 8d. Patron, in 1829, Earl Manvers. The church has been enlarged at the expense of the incorporated society. The living of St Nicholas is a discharged rectory, rated at £2 16s. 8d. Patron, the lord-chancellor. The church was rebuilt in 1678. The living of St Peter's is a discharged rectory, rated at £8 7s. 6d. Patron, the lord-chancellor. The church is an ancient edifice with a lofty spire. There are places of worship for various classes of Dissenters, a chapel for Roman Catholics, and a Jews' synagogue.

OLDHAM,

A very considerable township, and now a borough, in the parish of Oldham-cum-Prestwich, co.-palatine of Lancaster, $\frac{1}{2}$ m. N.E. from Manchester. This place has risen into notice of late years, and owes its present importance chiefly to the general introduction of steam-engine and water-mills. The principal manufactures are fustians, velveteens, cotton corduroys, &c. The trade of this town has much increased since the construction of the Oldham canal. A provision market is held on Saturday, and fairs 1st Thursday after Valentine's day; May 2d, July 8th, and 1st Wednesday after October 12th. The municipal affairs of this town are placed under the government of four head constables and their assistants. The reform act has conferred upon this populous place, including the several townships of Chadderton, Crompton, and Royton, the right of returning two members to parliament. The number of electors is about 1600. The first election occurred on the 13th of December, 1832, when William Cobbett and John Fielding, Esqs., were returned. Petty sessions for the vicinity are held here once a fortnight.

Living, &c.—The living is a perpetual curacy in the archd. and dio. of Chester, returned at £100, and in the patronage of the rector of Prestwich. There is also a chapel ded. to St Peter, the living of which is a perpetual curacy, returned at £60, in the same jurisdiction and patronage as the preceding. There are also several chapels-of-ease, two Methodist chapels, and other places of worship. The free school is limited to a few scholars; pursuant to the will of the late T. Henshaw, a blue-coat school has been erected in this town with a very liberal endowment, and an asylum for the blind at Manchester. There are several minor charities, a mechanics' institution, and a theatre.

Situation, &c.—This town stands in an elevated situation betwixt branches of the Irk and Medlock, and consists of numerous streets which extend along the side of a hill on the road from Manchester to York and Leeds. The manor formerly belonged to the family of Oldham, and was very extensive; but owing to the sale of property, the estate is now inconsiderable, and no manorial courts are held here. Oldham is $\frac{1}{2}$ m. N.E. of Manchester; $\frac{1}{2}$ m. N. of Ashton; $\frac{1}{2}$ m. S.S.E. of Rochdale; and 190 m. N.N.W. of London. Pop., in 1801, 12,024; in 1831, 60,513. A. The incorporation consists of a mayor, recorder, town-clerk, portmen, 12 burgesses, and 2 sergeants-at-mace. These officers are empowered to hold sessions whenever it may seem expedient, and a court of request for recovery of small debts. This place, until disfranchised by the reform act, returned two members to parliament. The market is on Monday. Fair, 24th of June. The trade of this town is not so considerable as it formerly was, owing to the loss of its harbour by the retiring of the sea, and its throwing up a barrier very dangerous to navigation. —Living, a perpetual curacy with Sudbourne rectory, in the archd. of Suffolk and dio. of Norwich. Patronage with the rectory. The church—ded. to St Bartholomew—is a very ancient structure, particularly the chancel: a great portion of this venerable building has fallen to decay, and the ruins present great diversity of style. It contains a remarkably beautiful font, and several very interesting monuments, especially one to the memory of the Rev. F. Mason, rector of Sudbourne for 80 years, and who died at the advanced age of 110. The porch and windows are also worthy of notice. The most interesting object at Orford is the ruin of a castle, situated on an eminence, supposed to have been originally the centre of the town; all that remains of this ancient fabric is the keep, which serves as a sea-mark. S.E. of this parish is a lighthouse, which, with another at Sudbourne, is termed 'the Orfordness lights.' The Walpole family derive the title of earl from this town. ORMSKIRK, a market-town and parish in West Derby hundred, co.-palatine of Lancaster, 40 m. S.W. by W. from Lancaster. It comprises the townships of Bickerstaffe, Birkdale, Burncough, Latham, and Scarsbrick; and the chapelry of Skeimersdale. It is a well-built town, consisting of four principal streets, diverging at right angles, with a market-place in the centre. There are several fine buildings, and the trade is good, owing to its connexion with the Leeds and Liverpool canal. Cotton-spinning, and the manufacture of a particular kind of thread for sail-cloth, are the chief employment of the inhabitants. The coal-mines in this parish are very extensive. Owthorpe-hall in this parish, was built by Col. J. Hutchison, a zealous parliamentarian, during the civil wars, and for some time governor of Nottingham castle. Pop., in 1801, 107; in 1831, 144. A. P., £975.

OXBOROUGH, or OXBURGH, a parish in the S. division of Greenhoe hundred, co. of Norfolk, 3½ m. E.N.E. from Stoke-Ferry. Living, a discharged rectory with Fouldon vicarage, in the archd. of Norfolk and dio. of Norwich, rated at £18 6s. 8d. Patron, Caius college, Cambridge. Church ded. to St John the Evangelist. Oxburgh-hall is a most interesting specimen of ancient domestic architecture. Pop., in 1801, 296; in 1831, 427. A. P., £2,752.

OXCLIFF, a township in Lancaster parish, co.-palatine of Lancaster, 2 m. W. from Lancaster.

OXCOMBE, a parish in Hill hundred, parts of Lindsey, co. of Lincoln, 5½ m. N.E. from Horncastle. Living, a discharged rectory in the archd. and dio. of Lincoln, rated at £6 15s. 7½d., returned at £50. Patron, in 1829, B. Grant, Esq. Church ded. to All Saints. Pop., in 1801, 32; in 1831, 32. A. P., £982.

OXENBOURNE, a tything in East Meon parish, co. of Southampton, 4 m. S.W. from Petersfield.

OXENDEN (GREAT), a parish in Rothwell hundred, co. of Northampton, 14½ m. N. from Northampton. Living, a rectory in the archd. of Northampton and dio. of Peterborough, rated at £13 8s. 4d. Patron, in 1829, H. Boulton, Esq. Church ded. to St Helen. Pop., in 1801, 281; in 1831, 239. A. P., £2,660

OXENDEN (LITTLE), a hamlet in Little Bowdon parish, co. of Northampton, 2 m. S.W. from Market-Harborough.

OXENFIELD, in Hawkshead parish, co.-palatine of Lancaster, 1½ m. N. by W. from Hawkshead.

OXENFORD, a hamlet in West Dawlish parish, co. of Somerset.

OXENFORD, an impropriation in Witley parish, co. of Surrey.

OXENHALL, a parish in Botloe hundred, co. of Gloucester, 1 m. N.N.W. from Newent. Living, a discharged vicarage in the archd. of Hereford and dio. of Gloucester, rated at £9 12s. 6d., returned at £41. Patron, the bishop of Gloucester. Church ded. to St Ann. Pop., in 1801, 313; in 1831, 306. A. P., £2,139.

OXENHALL, a hamlet in Darlington parish, co.-palatine of Durham, 2½ m. S. from Darlington. In the neighbourhood are three curious pools said to be filled by water flowing from the river Tees by a subterraneous passage. Some persons have attributed the origin of these to an earthquake. They are called Hell Kettles.

OXENHOATH, in West Peckham parish, co. of Kent, 4 m. N.N.E. from Tunbridge.

OXENTON, a parish in the lower division of Tewkesbury hundred, co. of Gloucester, 4½ m. E. by S. from Tewkesbury. Church ded. to St John the Baptist. Pop., in 1801, 150; in 1831, 166. A. P., £1,887.

OXENWOOD, a hamlet in Shalbourne parish, co. of Wilts, 6½ m. N.N.E. from Ludgershall.

OXFORDSHIRE,

An inland county of England, bounded on the east by Buckinghamshire; on the south-west, south, and south-east by Berkshire; on the west by Gloucestershire; on the north and north-west by Warwickshire, and on the north-east by Northamptonshire. It contains 752 square miles, or 481,280 acres. Pop., in 1801, 109,620; in 1831, 152,100. A. P., £713,147. It extends from 51° 28' to 52° 9' north latitude, and from 1° 2' to 1° 38' west longitude.

Divisions, &c.—The co. is in the dio. of Oxford and province of Canterbury. It forms an archdeaconry, and contains the deaneries of Aston, Burcester, Chipping-Norton, Cuddesden, Deddington, Henley, Witney, and Woodstock. It contains 212 parishes, of which 99 are rectories, 72 vicarages, and 44 curacies. The civil divisions are into the hundreds of Bampton, Banbury, Binfield, Bloxham, Bullington, Chadlington, Dorchester, Ewelme, Langtree, Lawknor, Pirton, Ploughley, Thame, and Wootton. The chief towns are the city of Oxford, the boroughs of Banbury and Woodstock, and the market-towns of Bampton, Bicester, Burford, Chipping-Norton, Henley-on-Thames, Thame, Watlington, and Witney. The members of parliament for the shire are three in number, and are polled at Oxford, Deddington, Witney, and Nettlebed. The assizes are held at Oxford, as also the quarter sessions in January, April, July, and October. The rates, in 1827, amounted to £139,000, of which £119,738 19s. were expended on the poor.

Rivers, &c.—In general aspect, Oxfordshire presents considerable variety. In the southern parts there is much hilly land, especially about the Chiltern hills, which are well wooded. The central parts of the county are beautiful, but rather flat. The rivers are the Thames or Isis, the Cherwell, the Thame, the Evenlode, and the Windrush. The Thames bounds the county on the south; it rises in the county of Gloucester, and first touches this county at its south-western extremity. It receives the waters of the Windrush, Evenlode, and Cherwell, after which it becomes navigable, and passes Dorchester. It now is joined by the Thame, and changes its name to the Thames; by which, however, it appears to have been formerly known throughout its whole course. It quits the county at a short distance below Henley, passing between those of Berks and Buckingham. It abounds in fish.—The Cherwell rises in Northamptonshire, and enters the county near Banbury. It joins the Thames near Oxford.—The Thame rises on the borders of Bucks, near Chinnor; enters Oxfordshire in the vicinity of Waterstock, and joins the Isis a little below Dorchester.—The Evenlode rises near the north-western border of the county, and falls into the Isis, a few miles above the city of Oxford.—The Windrush rises on the border of Gloucestershire, passes Burford and Witney, and falls into the Isis near Northmoor. Besides these rivers, numerous smaller streams intersect the country.

Soil.—The soil of Oxfordshire is of three kinds: red land, stone-brash land, and chalk land. The northern part of the county consists chiefly of red land, and is the most fertile division. It consists of a deep-red, sandy loam, on a substratum of red grit-stone. The extent of this district is calculated at about 79,635 acres. The stone-brash district lies in the middle of the county, and extends to 164,023 acres. The soil consists of a dry, sandy loam, mingled with limestone. The chalk land is the Chiltern district, occupying the south-eastern extremity of the county, and about 64,778 acres in extent. The substratum is chalk, the soil varying from loam to clay, with many flints intermingled. The minerals of the county are not numerous. Freestone, lime, and slate, are abundant; good ochre is found at Shotover.

Published by Arch^d Bullock & Co. along w.

Productions.—The whole of the county is fertile, and capable of producing good wheat. Barley and oats are also much cultivated. Pease, beans, and turnips, are cultivated extensively; but the manner of cropping is very irregular. Clover, trefoil, and sainfoin, are abundant. The grass-lands are extensive, especially on the river banks. There are many dairy farms, and much butter is made for the London market. On the banks of the Thames, Isis, and Cherwell is much excellent feeding land. Calves are reared in great numbers for the London market. No particular breed of cattle prevails, nor does any appear to be indigenous. The stock of sheep is large, consisting chiefly of the South Down, Berkshire, New Leicester, and a Spanish breed.

Wood.—Wood is abundant in Oxfordshire, especially in the Chiltern district, where natural beech-woods of great extent occur. Whichwood forest, consisting of 34 coppices, is 6,720 acres in extent. The coppices contain chiefly oak, ash, beech, and elm. The whole is subject to a right of commonage for horses and sheep. Otmoor, near Islip, is a tract of 4000 acres, formerly common, but recently enclosed under an act, obtained in 1815. Many parishes have commons of moderate extent.

Manufactures.—The manufactures are not numerous. Blankets are made at Witney; gloves and steel articles at Woodstock. Lace-making is common in the southern part of the county. At Banbury is a manufactory for a coarse species of velvet called Shag.

Canals, &c.—The Oxford canal is of great advantage to the county. It enters at the northern extremity, follows the course of the Cherwell, crosses it near Banbury, and communicates with the Thames near Oxford. It communicates with Birmingham, Liverpool, and Manchester. The road from London to Cheltenham, Gloucester, and Hereford, enters from Berkshire near Maidenhead; passes Henley, Dorchester, Oxford, Witney, and leaves the county a little way beyond Burford. The upper road from London to Oxford enters from the county of Buckingham near High Wycombe, and passes through Stokenchurch, Tetworth, and Wheatley to Oxford. From that city it proceeds by Wolvercote, Woodstock, and Little Rollright to Gloucestershire. The London and Holyhead road passes two portions of the county. The roads are generally good, being chiefly made with gravel. The antiquities of Oxford are not numerous. Roman and British coins have been dug up at different periods. Of the great Prætorian roads, only the Iknield street passes through Oxfordshire. The nature of the ground renders its trace not so distinct as it is in other counties. It enters from the county of Buckingham near Chinnor, runs near Lewknor, Shirburn, Watlington, and Ipsden, and leaves the county somewhere near Goring.

At the dissolution there were about 40 religious houses in this county. The most important monastic relic is the cathedral church of Oxford, formerly the church of the abbey of St Frideswide. Some fine specimens of Saxon and Norman architecture remain among the parish churches.

In this county are the fine seats of Blenheim, Ditchley park, belonging to Viscount Dillon; Nuneham-Courtney to the earl of Harcourt, and Wroxton priory to the earl of Guildford.

Chalybeate springs are numerous. Many fossil remains have been found in the gravel beds.

OXFORD.

A city, the capital of the county of Oxford, having separate jurisdiction, but locally situated in the hundred of Wootton. It has existed from a very remote period, and, in consequence, its origin is involved in total obscurity. Its name, which was formerly Oxenford, was supposed to have been derived from a ford over the river Isis much crossed by oxen. It is, however, with more probability, supposed to have been a corruption of Ousenford, the ford over the river Ouse, which is regarded as the ancient name of the Isis. Nevertheless, the former supposition has apparently been regarded as the more probable by the framers of the city-arms, in which there is an ox crossing a river. The town certainly existed, and had been noted as the seat of schools before the time of Alfred the Great, with whom its authentic history commences. All that has been said of its history, previous to his reign, may be regarded as merely traditional, with the exception of its having been noticed in a bull by Pope Martin II. in 802, as an ancient academy. "About 730, Didanus, a Saxon prince, founded here a nunnery to the honour of St Mary and All Saints, which consisted of 12 religious virgins of noble birth, under the government of his own daughter, Frideswide, who being buried here, and afterwards canonized for a saint, this monastery, in process of time, was dedicated to his memory, and called almost always by her name. But the nuns having been dispersed by the Danish wars, this church came into the possession of secular canons, and was burnt to the ground, A. D. 1004; afterwards it was rebuilt, and better endowed for them by King Ethelrid. A certain king, before the Norman conquest, is said to have expelled these canons, and to have given this monastery to the monks of Abendon for some few years, and then to have restored the canons. After the conquest, the seculars were again ejected, and an abbot and monks were here for some time; then the priests got in once more, and continued till A. D. 1111, or 1121, at which time Roger, bishop of Salisbury, placed in this church a convent of regular canons of the order of St Austin, under the care of Guimond, a learned clerk and chaplain to Henry I., who became the first prior. The revenues of this religious house were valued before its suppression at £284 8s. 9d. It was suppressed by virtue of a bull from Pope Clement VII., dated 3d April, 1524, allowed of and confirmed May 10th, by King Henry VIII., who, by letters patent, dated July 1st, 1525, granted the site and lands to Cardinal Wolsey, who thereupon began to found his college." The city was burnt by the Danes in 1013 and 1032. In 1036, a wittenagemote was held here for the purpose of settling the succession to the throne of Canute, when Harold Harefoot was crowned, and retaliated on the town some injuries which his train suffered in a tumult. At the conquest, Oxford resisted the dominion of the Norman prince, who took it by storm, and erected a fortress in which a garrison was left. A council was held here by William Rufus, and Henry I. built here a residence called Beaumont-hall, in which his daughter Matilda was afterwards besieged by Stephen. During the siege, Stephen repaired the walls of the city which had been built, according to tradition, in the 7th century. Various parliaments were held here, especially that of Henry II., for resisting the papal authority; and another of the same prince for considering the partition of Ireland. Richard I., who was born in Beaumont-hall, gave many important privileges to Oxford. John and Henry III. held parliaments here, and Henry VIII. erected it into a see. Lalimer and Ridley, and Cranmer archbishop of Canterbury, were burnt here in 1553 and 1556. In 1625, the parliament was held here, the plague having driven them from London. The city was the head quarters of Charles I. during a part of the civil war, but was taken in 1646 by General Fairfax. Another parliament was held here in 1666 on account of the plague, and the last was convened in 1681, and dissolved after sitting but a few days.

General Description.—The town is situated on a gentle eminence, in a valley, at the confluence of the rivers Isis and Cherwell, which, descending towards the south and uniting at a very acute angle, nearly encompass the city; the former on the west and south, the latter on the east. Along the rivers, and between them and the city, lies a tract of very beautiful and luxuriant meadows. Beyond these the prospect is bounded on the east, south, and west, by an amphitheatre of hills, while it extends indefinitely towards the north, over a rich champaign country in the highest state of cultivation. Over the rivers are several handsome bridges of stone. There are four principal entrances to the city. That from London crosses the Cherwell by Magdalene bridge, a handsome structure, 526 feet in length, and erected in 1779 at an expense of £8,000. This entrance is very agreeable, including a view of the vale of Cherwell, the church of St Clements, Magdalen college, and Christ church meadows. This entrance terminates in the High-street, which is regarded as one of the finest streets in Europe, from its graceful curve and the number of public buildings, chiefly of old date, by which it is adorned. The entrances from Woodstock and Abingdon also pass over bridges, and are rendered interesting by various picturesque objects. The town is divided into four parts by the High-street and St Giles'-street, which intersect each other at right angles at its centre. Both these streets are paved and lighted with gas. St Giles'-street contains fewer public buildings, but more modern residences, than the other.

Trade, &c.—The city has some trade, especially in the transit of corn and coal. It has long been celebrated for its brawn. The river Thames and the Oxford canal, which communicates with those of Birmingham, Coventry, and Warwick, are of immense importance to its commerce. Wednesday and Saturday are market-days; and fairs are held on May 3d, Monday after St Giles' day, Sept. 1st, and Thursday before New Michaelmas. Here are warm and cold baths; races are held annually in the Port-meadow.

Municipal Government.—The first charter was granted by Henry II. It had previously received various grants, which were confirmed by this, which likewise added the same rights and privileges as were enjoyed by the citizens of London, and appointed the mayor to act with the lord mayor of London, as chief butler at the coronation. The charter was renewed by Henry III. Various renewals have been made, and at present the city is governed under a charter of James I., granted in 1605. The corporation, in terms of this charter, consists of a mayor, recorder, high-steward, four aldermen, eight assistants, two bailiffs, two chamberlains, 24 common-councillmen, a town-clerk, and subordinate officers. The freedom of the city is inherited, or obtained by apprenticeship, gift, or purchase. Port-meadow—a tract of 440 acres—belongs to the freemen. The freemen choose the mayor annually from the number of the aldermen or assistants, and to him an oath is annually administered by the vice-chancellor of the university, that he will protect and maintain all the privileges of the university. Those who have served the office of chamberlain are alone eligible as bailiffs. A commission under the great seal is from time to time conferred on the mayor, recorder, aldermen, and assistants, to act as justices of the peace within the city and liberties, which their charter of incorporation does not entitle them to do. They have also a commission of gaol delivery; they hold courts of quarter-session for all offences save high treason; and courts of record for pleas and debt.

The town-hall is a handsome building of stone, erected in 1752. Here are also the city bridewell, the county gaol, and house of correction, occupying the site of an ancient castle. The assizes for the county and election of knights of the shire are held here.

See, &c.—The county of Oxford was originally included in the see of Lincoln, but in 1542, Henry VIII. separated it, and established the abbey chapel at Osney, as the cathedral church. It was subsequently transferred to the chapel of the monastery of St Frideswide, dedicated to Christ. The see includes the whole county, except seven parishes. The chapter consists of a bishop, dean, archdeacon, eight canons, eight chaplains, 101 students, eight clerks, eight choristers, and 24 almshouses. The cathedral is a cruciform structure, in the Norman style. Much of the interior is remarkably rich, and there are some ancient monuments of great interest.

Livinge.]—The livings in the city are the following:—St Aldate, a discharged rectory, rated at £8 13s. 4d., returned at £120, and in the patronage of Pembroke college.—All Saints, a perpetual curacy, united with Lincoln college, rated at £5 6s. 8d., and returned at £50.—St Andrew's, St Benedict's, St Budoc's, St Catherine's, St Edward's, and St George's, were formerly parishes, the churches of which have long ago been demolished.—St Cross, or Holywell, is a curacy, returned at £95, and in patronage of Merton college.—St Ebbas, a discharged rectory, rated at £3 5s., returned at £98.—St Clement's, a donative, returned at £80, and in patronage of the crown.—St Giles, a discharged vicarage, rated at £14 12s. 3d., returned at £102, and in patronage of St John's college.—St John the Baptist, a perpetual curacy, in patronage of Merton college, to which the church is chapel.—St Martin's, a discharged rectory, rated at £8 1s. 5d., and in patronage of the crown.—St Mary Magdalene's, a curacy, rated at £6, returned at £120, and in patronage of Christ church.—St Mary the Virgin, a vicarage, rated at £5 4s. 2d., returned at £75, and in patronage of Oriel college.—The church of St Mary is that of the university.—St Michael's, a curacy, returned at £80, and united to Lincoln college.—St Mildred's church is demolished.—St Peter-le-Bayley, a rectory, rated at £3 14s. 2d., returned at £40, and in patronage of the crown.—St Peter-in-the-East, a discharged vicarage, rated at £13 2s. 1d., returned at £132, and in patronage of Merton college. The church is of high antiquity, and in the Norman style.—St Thomas, a curacy, returned at £100, and in patronage of Christ church.—The Baptists, Roman Catholics, and Wesleyan Methodists, have places of worship here.

In 1658, John Nixon founded and endowed a charity school, from which two boys are annually apprenticed on an endowment of £35 per annum, left by Mrs Jean Nixon in 1685. Here is a blue-coat school for 70 boys, half of whom are clothed and fed, and some are apprenticed. Here are also various endowments for the education of children of particular parishes; a school for 36 girls, supported by subscription among the ladies; a national school for 330 boys, supported by the university; a Lancasterian school for 100 boys and 50 girls; a charity school, founded by Mrs Macbride, for 200 girls. Here are an excellent infirmary, founded by the trustees of Dr Radcliffe; a house of industry; and a lunatic asylum at Headington. There are also a few endowed almshouses.

The population of Oxford, in 1801, was 11,749; in 1831, 20,434. A. P., £37,853.—Two newspapers are published here weekly. In the vicinity are many handsome residences. Oxford confers the title of earl on the Harley family.

UNIVERSITY.]—The origin of the university of Oxford has given rise to many disputes. Alfred is usually regarded as the founder, though there is reason to believe that it existed previously as the seat of a celebrated school. Authentic history does not carry us back into that period, in which it is probable that any schools which did exist were solely in connexion with the various monastic establishments which appear to have been founded here at a very remote period. Alfred, who found his dominions in a miserably defective condition with respect to learning, founded here three schools or colleges, and ordained that each possessor of two hydes of land within the realm should cause his sons to be educated at this or some other seat of learning. This university, such as it was, was destroyed by the Danes, its buildings were pillaged and the members dispersed, and it appears to have been neglected till after the conquest. After the conquest, Robert D'Oily founded a collegiate church here, on the annexation of which to Osney abbey, the buildings were given up to students, who were under the control of a warden appointed by the abbot. Various members of that abbey assumed the office of teachers, and the university flourished to such an extent, that in the reign of Stephen, not less than 30,000 students resided in the city, being accommodated in inns, or hostels, erected for their accommodation, to the number of 300.

The university received its first charter in 1248, from Henry III. Merton college was founded in 1274, and appears to have been the first establishment of the kind in the university. The privileges of its members have been extended or altered by various kings. The university, as a corporate body, consisting of a number of united colleges, or halls, was incorporated in 13th of Queen Elizabeth, by the style and title of the chancellor, masters, and scholars of the university of Oxford. There are 19 colleges, the members of which are severally incorporated, and five halls which are not incorporated, each having peculiar laws, but being subject to the general statutes of the university. The laws of the university now in force were compiled in the reign of James I. Before becoming a member of the university of Oxford, it is necessary to subscribe the 39 articles of the church of England, to take the oaths of supremacy and allegiance, and to swear to observe all the statutes, privileges, and customs of the university.

The university is governed by a chancellor, vice-chancellor, high steward, and two proctors; other officers are the public orator, keeper of the archives, registrars, curators of the theatre, keeper of the Ashmolean museum, clerks of the market, and inferior officers, such as esquire and yeoman bedels. The chancellor, who holds his office for life, is usually a nobleman of distinction, elected by the house of convocation. He only attends on extraordinary occasions. The vice-chancellor is appointed by the chancellor from among the heads of colleges, under the approval of the convocation. He has four assistants, who must also be heads of houses; his duties are the most important of any, as he is the highest resident officer. He is convener of all meetings and courts, he enforces the observance of the laws, punishes delinquents, is a magistrate of the city and county and also of Berkshire, and licenses taverns in the city. The high-steward is appointed by the chancellor; he is always a nobleman, and acts as assistant to the chancellor and vice-chancellor, especially in the trial of capital causes in which members of the university are concerned. The proctors, who are the more immediate guardians of the laws in the university, are chosen annually from among masters in arts of not less than four or more than ten years' standing. The public orator, who is chosen by the house of convocation, writes public letters and addresses, delivers harangues, and presents honorary degrees. The offices of the keeper of the archives, the registrar of the university, the registrar of the university court, and the clerk of the market, are sufficiently described by their names.

The affairs of the university are managed by the assemblies of congregation and convocation. The house of congregation consists of doctors of every faculty, heads of colleges and halls, professors, public lecturers, masters of schools, public examiners, deans and censors of colleges, and masters of arts above one year's standing. These are called regents. The business of the house is confined almost entirely to the passing of graces and dispensations, and to the granting of degrees. The house of convocation consists of regents, masters in their fifth year, and persons who have been regents and retired from the university, though still retaining their names on the books. This house transacts all important public business. At both the chancellor, or vice-chancellor, or the joint proctors, have an absolute veto on all proceedings except elections, when, in certain cases, the presiding officer has the casting vote. The chancellor holds a weekly court of record for the recovery of debt, its jurisdiction extending only to the members of the university.

The elective franchise was bestowed on the regent masters of arts and doctors in convocation, by James I.; and two members have been regularly returned since 1603. The vice-chancellor is the returning officer.

The regius professorships are seven in number. Those of divinity, civil law, medicine, Hebrew, and Greek, were founded by Henry VIII., who burdened the dean and canons of Christ church with a yearly payment of £40 to the first, fourth, and fifth. That of modern languages and history was founded in 1724 by George I.; that of botany by George III., in 1793. In addition to the original endowments of these professorships, to that of divinity are annexed a canonry in Christ church, and the rectory of Ewelme; to that of civil law, a prebend in Salisbury cathedral; to that of medicine, the mastership of Ewelme hospital and the Tomlin's lectureship on anatomy.—The Margaret professorship of divinity was founded by the countess of Richmond, mother of Henry VII. It is tenable for two years, but the professor is usually allowed to retain it for life.—

The professorship of natural philosophy was founded in 1618 by Sir Wm. Sedley. The estate with which it was endowed now produces £120 per annum.—The Savilian professorships of geometry and astronomy were founded in 1619 by Sir Henry Savile. This is open to eminent men of all nations; the appointment is vested in the archbishop of Canterbury, lord-chancellor, chancellor of the university, bishop of London, principal secretary of state, chief justices, chief baron of the exchequer, and the dean of the arches.—The Camden professorship of ancient history was founded and endowed with the manor of Bexley, in 1622, by William Camden, the celebrated antiquary.—The professorship of music was founded by William Herther in 1626.—The professorship of Arabic was founded by Laud, archbishop of Canterbury, in 1636; its endowments arise from lands in the parish of Bray, county of Berks.—The professorship of botany was founded and endowed with £3,000, in 1738, by William Sherrard. The patronage is vested in the royal college of physicians.—The professorship of poetry was founded by Henry Birkhead, Esq. It is tenable for five years, and one re-election is permitted.—The Anglo-Saxon professorship was founded in 1750 by Dr Richard Rawlinson. It is held for five years, and is endowed with rent-charges on lands in Lancashire.—The Vinerian professorship of common law was founded in 1755 by C. Viner, Esq. This professorship was first held by Sir Wm. Blackstone.—The professorship of clinical medicine in the Radcliffe infirmary was founded by the earl of Lichfield in 1772. It is open to doctors of five years' standing, on the appointment of the house of convocation.—In 1803, George Aldrich, M.D., founded professorships of anatomy, practice of medicine, and chemistry.—The professorship of political economy was founded in 1825 by Henry Drummond, Esq., who endowed it with a rent-charge of £100 on his estates in the co. of Surrey.

There are readerships in Arabic, experimental philosophy, mineralogy, geology, and anatomy. Lectures in divinity were founded in 1780 by the Rev. John Bampton. The heads of colleges, the canons of Christ church, and the professors of divinity and Hebrew, preach the university sermons every Sunday morning during term, in rotation.

The Radcliffe travelling fellowships are open to all members of the university. The endowment of each is £600 per annum, tenable for ten years, five of which must be spent in foreign countries. The chambers belonging to the fellows are in New College. The patronage is vested in the trustees of the Radcliffe library.—The Vinerian fellowships of £50 per annum, and the scholarships of £30, are also tenable for 10 years.—The Craven scholarships are tenable, some for 14, some for 7 years.—The Ireland scholarships for undergraduates are endowed with £30 per annum each.

The periods during which the university is open are called terms. These are four in number: 1. Michaelmas, commencing 10th October, and ending 17th December; 2. Hilary, commencing 14th January, and ending on the Saturday before Palm-Sunday; 3. Easter, beginning on the tenth day after Easter-Sunday, ending on the day before Whit-Sunday; 4. Trinity, commencing on the Wednesday after Whit-Sunday, and ending on the Saturday after the first Tuesday in July. Residence during a certain number of terms is necessary towards the attainment of degrees, but the first and second are kept by a residence of six weeks each, the second and third by a residence of three.

The degree of bachelor in arts requires the keeping of 16 terms, except in cases of sons of peers, and students who keep terms for a master's degree, or for honours in civil law, when 12 are sufficient. A bachelor in civil law requires 28 terms, but a certain number are usually remitted. Doctors in civil law must attend five years more; bachelor in medicine one year from the regency; doctor in the same faculty four years' residence from matriculation.

For the degree of bachelor in arts, the candidate submits to exercises or examinations in the classics, logic, and Euclid's Elements of Geometry, the rudiments of religion, moral philosophy, and physics. For the bachelorship in divinity, law, or medicine, the exercises in public disputations; for the doctorships, the reading of three lectures. Several public prizes are given annually by the chancellor, and from the revenues of certain foundations, for which all members of the university may be competitors.—The following livings are in patronage of the university:—South Moreton, Berks, a rectory; South Petherwin, Cornwall, a vicarage; Holme-Cultram, Cumberland, a vicarage; Gatcomb, Southampton, a rectory; Lynton, Leicester, a vicarage; Stutchbury, Northampton, a rectory; St Giles, Oxford, a lectureship; Kirkdale, York, a curacy.

University College is supposed to have been one of those founded by Alfred; but as the Danes are known to have dispersed the ancient halls, we cannot with propriety go further back than the year 1249, when William, archdeacon of Durham, left a sum of money for the support of a society of masters chosen from different halls. It would appear that these did not assume the style of a separate society till 1280; nor were they known by their present title till a later period. They settled in their present site about 1343, taking the title of "the master and scholars of the hall of the university of Oxford." On the foundation there are a master, 12 fellows, and 24 scholars: the number of members was lately 218. The king is visitor. The master and fellows have the patronage of Tarrant-Grenville rectory, Dorset; North Cerney rectory, Gloucester; Headbourn-Worthy rectory, Hants; Flamstead curacy, Herts; Elton rectory, Hunts; Checkendon rectory, Oxford; Kingdon rectory, Somerset; Beckley rectory, Sussex; Arncliffe vicarage and Malsenby rectory, York. The college buildings are in the ancient style of English architecture, with some mixture of Italian architecture.

Baliol College, founded about 1260 by John Baliol of Bernard-castle, father of Baliol, king of Scotland. The society consists of a master, 12 fellows, and 14 scholars. The college elects its own visitor, who is at present archbishop of Canterbury. In this college are 33 scholarships or exhibitions, some of these are of great value; ten, for scholars from Glasgow university, on the foundation of John Snell, Esq., are endowed with £130 per annum each, and tenable for ten years. The master and fellows have patronage of the following livings:—The rectories of Duloe, Cornwall; All Saints, St Leonards, St Nicholas, St Botolph, and Holy Trinity, in the town of Colchester; Tending, Essex; Brattleby, Fillingham, and Riseholm, Lincoln; Kilve cura Strington, Huntspill, and Timsbury, Somerset; the vicarages of Duloe, Cornwall; Beer-Regis, Dorset; Markstay, Essex; Abbotsley, Hunts; St Lawrence Jewry and St Mary Magdalene, London; and Long Benton, Northumberland. The number of members was lately 248. The buildings are of great antiquity. Wickcliffe, the reformer, was master of this college, having previously studied in Merton.

Merton College.—Walter de Merton, bishop of Rochester, and lord-high-chancellor of England, founded a school at Merton in Surrey, which he removed to Oxford in 1274. As a corporate body, the society of Merton is the most ancient in the university, and it consists of a warden, 24 fellows, 14 post-masters, 4 scholars, 2 chaplains, and 2 clerks. The archbishop of Canterbury is visitor. Natives of the dioceses of St Asaph, Bangor, St David's, Llandaff, Hereford, Chichester, Exeter, Rochester, Lichfield and Coventry, Chester, and Carlisle, are not eligible as fellows. There are well endowed exhibitions for the post-masters and scholars. In patronage of the warden and fellows are the following livings:—The rectories of Gamlingay, Cambridge; Kibworth-Beauchamp, Leicester; Cuxham and Ibbstone, Oxford; Farley, Surrey; Lapworth, Warwick; the vicarages of Diddington, Hunts; Elham, Kent; Embleton and Ponteland, Northumberland; Malden, Surrey; Great Wolford, Warwick; Stratton-St-Margaret, Wilts; and the curacies of Holywell and Wolvercote, Oxford; St John and St Peter, city of Oxford; and Chessington, Surrey. The oldest part of the buildings is the library, forming part of the third quadrangle, and founded in 1376. The chapel is a remarkably handsome structure in the decorated style of English architecture. Dr Harvey, who discovered the circulation of the blood, Duns Scotus, John Wicliffe, Anthony Wood, Sir Richard Steele, and other celebrated persons, have been members of Merton college. Number of members was recently 127.

Exeter College was founded in 1314 by Walter de Stapledon, bishop of Exeter, from whom it took its original appellation of Stapledon hall. Its deed of incorporation was obtained shortly after 1565, and at present the society consists of a rector and 25 fellows, and the number of members was recently 268. The bishop of Exeter is visitor. In patronage of the rector and fellows are the following livings:—The rectories of Bushey, Herts; Wootton, Northampton; Ripe and Waldron, Sussex; Beverstock and Somerford Magna, Wilts; the vicarages of Long Wittenham, Berks; Menheniot, Cornwall; Merton and South Newington, Oxford; that of Kidlington, Oxfordshire, is annexed to the rectory. None of the buildings are ancient. The library contains many books of high value.

Oriel College was founded in 1336 by Adam de Brome, almoner to Edward II., who became its first provost. In 1338 it was called St Mary's hall, but a house called L'Oriele having been conferred on it by the king, it took from thence its present name. The society consists of a provost and eighteen fellows, and the number of members lately on the books was 298. There are fifteen exhibitions, and the king is visitor. In patronage of the provost and fellows are the following livings:—The rectories of Ufton, Berks; Purleigh, Essex; Abbot's-Cromhall and Tortworth, Gloucester; Swanwick, Somerset; Plymptree Devon; Saltfleet, Lincoln; the vicarages of Celeby, Lincoln; St Mary, Oxford; Twiverton, Somerset; and Aberford, York; and the curacy of Morton-Pinkney, Northampton. The chapel, which is the oldest portion of the building, was completed in 1642. Here was educated Dr Joseph Butler, Sir Walter Raleigh, and Sir John Holt.

Queen's College was founded by Robert de Eggesfield, confessor to Philippa, queen of Edward III., in 1340. The society consists of a provost and 24 fellows, 16 of whom must be natives of Cumberland and Westmoreland. There are 48 exhibitions, and the archbishop of York is visitor. The provost and fellows have the following livings:—The rectories of Sulhamstead-Abbas, and Sulhamstead-Barnister, Berks; Holwell, Somerset; Niton, Bramshot, Knight's-Enham, Headley and Newnham, Hants; Bleachingdon, Charlton upon-Otmore, Hampton-Poyle and South Weston, Oxford; English Bicknor, Gloucester; Pontesbury, Salop; Upton-Scudamore, Wilts; the vicarages of Sparsholt, Berks; Chedworth, Gloucester; Bramley, Carisbrooke, Godshill, Milford, Monk's-Sharborne and Holy-Rood, Southampton; Newbold-Pacey, Warwick; Brough, Westmoreland; Wendron, Cornwall; and the curacy of Hordle, Hants. The number of members was lately 351. The buildings were all erected in the course of the last century, except the library, which bears date 1690. The books are of great value, and the number of volumes is above 18,000. Here were educated Halley, Addison and Tickell, Henry V., Dr John Mill, Collins, and Bishop Tanner.

New College was founded in 1386 by William of Wykeham, bishop of Winchester, who also instituted a school at Winchester for the preparation of scholars. The society consists of a warden, 70 fellows and scholars, 10 chaplains, an organist, 3 clerks, and 16 choristers.

The fellows and scholars must be taken from Wykeham's school. The bishop of Winchester is visitor. The warden and fellows are patrons of the following livings:—The rectories of Akely, Hardwick, Great Horwood, Newton-Longville, Radcliffe, and Tingewick, Bucks; Abbots-Stoke, Dorset; Birchanger and Little Lampford, Essex; Sabam-Toney, Stratton St Michael, St John Madder-Market, Weston and Witchingham, St Faith, Norfolk; Paulers-Pury, Northampton; Bucknell, Heyford-Warren, Stanton St John, and Wootton, Oxford; Worthen, Salop; Long Ditton, Surrey; Stockton, Warwick; Alton-Barnes, Berwick-St-John, and Donhead-St-Mary, Wilts; and Colerne, Wilts,—a sinecure annexed to the wardenship; the vicarages of Whaddon, Bucks; Steeple-Morden, Cambridge; Hornchurch and Writtle, Essex; Marshfield, Gloucester; Heckfield, Hants; East Adderbury, Cheston, and Swadcliffe, Oxford; and Colerne, Wilts; and the curacies of Roxwell and Romford, Essex; Mattingley, Hants; and Epwell, Oxford. The chapel is a remarkably rich specimen of the florid style of English architecture. It contains some fine paintings and sculptures; here is preserved also the superb silver-gilt cresset of William of Wykeham. The number of members was lately 158.

Lincoln College owes its foundation to Richard Fleming, bishop of Lincoln, in 1427, and was completed by Rotherham, archbishop of York. The society consists of a rector, 12 fellows, 13 exhibitioners, 8 scholars, and 1 Bible clerk. The number of members was lately 142. The bishop of Lincoln is visitor. The rector holds the rectory of Twyford, Bucks. The following livings are in patronage of the rector and fellows:—The rectories of Cublington, Bucks; Winterborne-Abbas, Dorset; Hadleigh and Great Leighs, Essex; and Waddington, Lincoln; and the curacies of All Saints, St Michael, Long Corabe and Forest-hill, Oxford. The chapel is a handsome structure. Here were educated Sir W. D'Avenant, John Wesley, James Harvey, Dr Robert Sanderson, Dr Matthew Tindal, and Archbishop Potter.

All Souls' College was founded in 1437 by Henry VI. and Henry Chichele, archbishop of Canterbury. The society consists of a warden, 40 fellows, 2 chaplains, clerks, and 6 scholars. The number of members was recently 100. The archbishop of Canterbury is visitor. The warden and fellows have patronage of the following livings:—The rectories of Weston-Turville, Bucks; Welwyn, Herts; Chessfield, Elmley, and Harrietsham, Kent; Harpenden, Oxford; Buckland, Surrey; Barford-St-Martin, Wilts; the vicarages of Barking, Essex; New Romney and Upchurch, Kent; Lewknor, Oxford; Abberbury, Salop; Llun-gemh and Penarth, Glamorgan. The warden holds the rectory of East Lockinge, county of Berks. The chapel is a handsome structure, with painted windows. The altar-piece is the celebrated Notime tangere of Raffaello Menga. The library, which contains 40,000 volumes was bequeathed to the college by Colonel Codrington, who had been a member. Leland the antiquary, Sir C. Wren, Sir Wm. Blackstone, Linacre, Caius, and Sydenham, were educated here.

Magdalen College was founded in 1456 by William of Waynfleet, bishop of Winchester. The society consists of a president, 40 fellows, 30 scholars, a schoolmaster, an usher, 4 chaplains, an organist, 8 clerks, and 16 choristers; and the number of members was recently 167. The bishop of Winchester is visitor. The president and fellows have patronage of the following livings:—The rectories of Appleton, Aston-Tirrol, East Hiale and Tubury, Berks; Beaconsfield and Saunderton, Bucks; Stanway, Essex; Slimbridge, Gloucester; Candlesby, Horsington, Saltfleet by All Saints and Swaby, Lincoln; Brandistone, Norfolk; Great Houghton, Northampton; East Bridgeford, Notts; Ducklington, Stanlake, and Swerford, Oxford; Ashurst and Bramber, Sussex; Boynton, Fittleton, and Winterbourne-Basset, Wilts; the vicarages of Ashbury, Berks; Basingstoke, Selborne, and East Woldham, Hants; Evenley, Northampton; Willoughby, Warwick; and Dinton, Wilts; and the curacies of West Tisted, Hants; and Horsepath, Oxford. The buildings of this college have an air of venerable antiquity. The chapel has been partially modernized; it contains some interesting monuments, and the windows are formed of elegantly stained glass. Above the altar is a fine picture of Christ bearing the cross, attributed to Morales, a Spanish painter. The gardens are extensive, and contain the promenade called Addison's walk. The tower is lofty, and in a very rich style of English architecture. Lilly the astrologer, Addison and Collins, Cardinals Wolsey and Pole, Dr Sacheverell, and Gibbon the historian, were members of this college.

Brasenose College was founded in 1509 by William Smyth, bishop of Lincoln, and Sir Richard Sutton of Prestbury in Cheshire. The society consists of a principal and 20 fellows, with 32 scholars and 15 exhibitioners. The number of members was recently 403. The bishop of Lincoln is visitor. The principal and fellows have patronage of the following livings:—The rectories of Dudcote and West Shefford, Berks; Tedestone-Delamers, Hereford; St Matthew, Bethnal-Green, Stratford-le-Bow, St Anne, Limehouse, Christ church, Spitalfields, Stepney, St George in the East, St John Wapping, Poplar, and St Mary Whitechapel, Middlesex; Great Billing, Cottingham, Middleton-Cheney, Wold, and Stoke-Bruerne, Northampton; Great Rollright and Steeple-Aston, Oxford; Clayton and Selham, Sussex; and Wootton-Rivers, Wilts; the lectureship of Rodborough, Gloucester; the vicarages of Gillingham, Kent; Preston, Lancashire; and Osburnby, Lincoln; the curacies of St John Bethnal-green; and Stepney, Middlesex. The style of architecture of the college buildings is a bad mixture of Gothic and Grecian architecture. John Fox, Dr Whitaker, and Dr Reginald Heber, were members of this college. The origin of the name of this college is said to have been the circumstance of the knocker of one of the ancient gates having been formed of a ring in a nose of brass.

Corpus Christi College was founded in 1516 by Richard Fox, bishop of Winchester, whose successors have been visitors. The society consists of a president, 20 fellows, 20 scholars, 2 chaplains, 2 clerks, and 2 choristers. The number of members was lately 132. PADSTOW, or PETROCSTOW,—anciently named Adelston—a sea-port, market-town, and parish, in Pyder hundred, co. of Cornwall, 30 m. W. by S. from Launceston. Its importance as a sea-port is not so great as it formerly was. About the 16th century the harbour of Padstow ranked amongst the finest on the western coast of England. The little foreign trade it now has is chiefly with Norway and America. The coasting trade is very extensive. There is much danger in entering the harbour: it has been said that 175 vessels have been wrecked and stranded, and more than 200 lives lost in the last 30 years within the limits of the port. An association, established in 1829, constructed some important works for the assistance of ships entering the harbour, and a life boat is attached to the apparatus. This town stands on an estuary formed by the confluence of the river Camel and other streams opening into St George's channel. The streets are paved, and the houses are covered with a fine blue slate which abounds in the vicinity. In the time of Elizabeth the town was incorporated and a market established. About the middle of the 17th century, the rights and privileges of the corporate body having been suffered to lapse by desuetude, the government was vested in the county magistrates, and subsequently transferred to the petty sessions at St Columb. A portreeve and other officers are chosen at the manorial court. The market is on Saturday. Fairs, April 18th and September 21st. Living, a discharged vicarage in the peculiar jurisdiction of the bishop of Exeter, rated at £11 3s. 4d. Patron, the Rev. C. Prideaux Brune. The church exhibits various styles of architecture. A large chapel for Wesleyan Methodists has been recently built here. A national school was established in 1819. The ancient records of this town speak of many monastic institutions having been founded here, and that the first religious house, called Laffenack, was established in 432 by St Patrick. Pop., in 1801, 1832; in 1831, 1822. A. P., £6,934.

PADWORTH, a parish in Theale hundred, co. of Berks, 8 m. S.W. by W. from Reading. Living, a rectory in the archd. of Berks and dio. of Salisbury, rated at £6 6s. 8d. Patron, the lord-chancellor. Living, a vicarage in the dio. of London, and in the peculiar jurisdiction and patronage of the dean and chapter of St Paul's. The old church of St Pancras—now used as a chapel-of-ease—is said to occupy the site of one of the earliest Christian churches in Britain. Its cemetery contains the remains of many eminent foreigners and other persons of distinction, among whom we may mention Tiberius Cavallo, General Paoli, Jeremy Collier, and Samuel Webbe. The new parochial church, situated in Euston square, is a splendid structure, after the model of the Eretheum at Athens. A new district church in Regent-square, was erected by parliamentary grant in 1824, the living of which is a distinct incumbency, in the vicar's patronage. There are also several other churches connected with this extensive district, besides places of worship for dissenters, a Roman Catholic chapel, and a Presbyterian church. The national school is on an extensive scale, and has generally 400 children attending; besides other charity schools there are one for Roman Catholic children, and the Welsh school in Gray's-Inn-Lane, established in 1714, and the Foundling hospital, founded by charter of George II. in 1739. PEMBROKESHIRE,

A county in South Wales, bounded N.E. by Cardigan, E. by Carmarthenshire, N.W. and S. by the Irish sea. Its extent from N. to S. 24 m., from E. to W. 30 m.

Divisions.—This county is divided into seven hundreds, viz. Castle-Martin, Dewisland, Daughleddan, Comaes, Cilgerran, Narberth, and Rôe, or Rhôs, besides the city of St David's, the borough of Haverford West, 9 market-towns, and 145 parishes. It sends one member to parliament. Pop., in 1801, 56,280; in 1831, 81,424.

Surface of the Country.—The surface of the country may in general terms be called plain and tolerably fertile. The only chain of mountains which belong exclusively to Pembrokeshire are the Prescelly, in the N.E. of which Moel-Eryr and Cwm-Cerwyn are the loftiest.

Soil and Agriculture.—In most districts the soil is waste and improvable, particularly in the S.W., where a rich, fertile, deep loam abounds. In other parts there is a dark grey loam on slate stone. In the N.E. is excellent pasturage land. Wheat is grown in the W. Harley, rye, oats, turnips, &c., in all parts. Coal, culm, limestone, lead ore, and ironstone, are found in this county.

Rivers.—The Teifi, or Tyvi, between Pembroke and Cardigan; the Cleddy, which has its source in the Prescelly mountains, and passing close to Narberth, turns S.W. and joins the W. Cleddy at Landshipping; the Douglodge rises in the W. of the county; the Neferm, Kefeynsfey, Gwain, Dead River, Biran, Rudford, and other tributary streams, adorn and fertilize the surface.

Trade and Commerce.—These are not very remarkable, though the county has great advantages for commerce in its numerous harbours and wide extent of coast. Cotton factories have been established at Haverford-West. Tin plate on the banks of the Teifi. The harbours of Newport, Fishguard, and Tenby, are secure and well sheltered; that of Milford-Haven facilitates a brisk trade in the supply of the interior of the county with manufactured goods, and the export of agricultural produce. The fisheries on the coast are the principal source of employment to a large portion of the inhabitants.

Antiquities.—This county is distinguished by numerous druidical and other antiquities. The circle and cromlech of the Druids is seen at Castle-Hendref, Drwsan, Treilly, Longhouse, Lech-y-Drybedd, Pentre-Evan, and other places. Several upright stones are frequent along the coast. There are also two Roman roads. The churches likewise rank with the memorials of antiquity; and there are vestiges of 19 castles, which seem to have been either the palaces of princes or baronial strongholds.

PEMBROKE, a borough and market-town, having separate jurisdiction, but local situation in Castle-Martin hundred, co. of Pembroke, South Wales, 10 m. S. by E. from Haverford-West, and 284 m. W. from London. The civil government is vested in a mayor, two bailiffs, sergeants-at-mace, and common-council. In conjunction with Melford, Tenby, and Wiston, it sends one member to parliament. The mayor of Pembroke is the returning officer. It is also one of the polling places for the county member. The market is on Wednesday and Saturday. Fairs, May 12th, Trinity Monday, St Peter's day, O. S., and September 25th. The town consists principally of a long street, and has three churches, St Mary's, St Michael's, and St Nicholas', a town-hall, free school, place of worship for Dissenters, and several good inns. The living is a union of three vicarages, in the archd. and dio. of St David's. Patron, Sir J. Owen, Bart. The trade with Ireland and North America is very prosperous, as is the coasting trade with South Wales, and the ports along the Bristol channel. The increasing importance of the town is on account of its proximity to Pembroke-dock, or Pater, where some of the largest navy ships have been built, and where there is constant employment for several hundred persons. Adjacent to this dock is a spacious fort, and a large market-place. The castle of Pembroke stands on a rock W. of the town, and underneath is a cavern called the Wogan, from its remarkable echo. The original founder of the castle and fortifier of this ancient town was Arnulph, son of Roger de Montgomery, earl of Shrewsbury, in the reign of William Rufus. The original building being destroyed by fire, the present fabric was erected by Owen, son of Cadwgan-ap-Bleddyn, prince of Powys, and is remarkable as the birth-place of Henry VII., and for the gallant resistance made by its garrison when it was held for Charles I. Pop., in 1801, 2515; in 1831, 6511. A. P., £11,005.

PENBURY, a parish in Washlingstone hundred, lathes of Aylesford, co. of Kent, 8½ m. S.E. from Tunbridge. PENRRHYN, a township and seaport in Llandegai parish, co. of Carnarvon, North Wales, adjacent to Bangor. Port Penrhyn, at the influx of the river Ogwen into the Menai straits, is considered the harbour of Bangor city. It has a commodious quay, and vessels of 300 tons can easily load and unload at the pier. The castle of Penrhyn is a magnificent structure, occupying the site of the palace of Roderic Molywog, prince of Wales in 720. In this castle is preserved an ancient hirlas, or drinking horn, which belonged to Sir Piers Gryffydd, a distinguished naval officer in 1598. Penrhyn slate quarry is considered one of the greatest curiosities in Wales. It is situated at Dolawen in Carnarvonshire, about 6 m. from Bangor, at the entrance of the romantic valley named Nant Frangon, and belongs to G. H. D. Pennant, Esq. of Penrhyn castle. The summit of the slate mountain is termed Ffrow, a name which signifies 'breast' or 'pap,' and is frequently given to the tops of hills which do not rise abruptly. The perpendicular height is not more than 600 or 700 yards. The solid masses of slate which are taken from this quarry are from 80 to 100 feet in height. The various pieces of slate are shaped upon the spot, according to the purposes for which they are intended, such as gravestones, chimney-pieces, covering of houses, cisterns, rails, &c. Formerly they were conveyed to the port at a very heavy expense, by means of carts drawn along the ordinary road, but afterwards an iron railroad was formed, which reaches from the quarry to Port Penrhyn, a distance of 6 m. Upon this line are several inclined or sloping planes. At Port Penrhyn the slates are shipped, not only for all parts of Great Britain, but even for the United States of America. The expense of the inclined planes and railroads connected with this quarry, and incurred by the late Lord Penrhyn, in diminishing the labour of conveying the slates, is said to have been upwards of £170,000. Pop. with the parish.

PENRRHYN, a township in Eglwys Rhos parish, co. of Carnarvon, North Wales, 3 m. N. by E. from Conway.

PENRRHYS, or PENRICE, a parish in Swansea hundred, co. of Glamorgan, South Wales, 10 m. W. from Swansea. Living, a perpetual curacy in the archd. of Glamorgan and dio. of St David's, certified at £5, returned at £37. Patron, Lord Vernon. Some of the ruins of Castle Pen-Rees are still to be seen, and on part of its site is the modern Penrice castle, an elegant structure, of which the family of Mansel Talbots are the present proprietors. Pop. of the parish, in 1801, 289; in 1831, 362. A. P., £1,051.

PENRITH, or NEW PENRITH, a market town and parish in Leath ward, co. of Cumberland, 18 m. S. by E. from Carlisle, comprising the townships of Burrowgate, Docking, Middlegate with Sandgate, Netherend-Bridge with Carleton, and Town with Plumpton-Head. The inhabitants are employed in agriculture, and the manufacture of checks, gingham, calicoes, &c. The market is on Tuesday and Saturday. Fairs April 25th and 26th, Whit-Tuesday, September 27th, and November 11th. The markets and fairs are subject to the control of a bailiff appointed by the duke of Devonshire, whose steward holds a court-baron every third Monday. The county court is held here, petty sessions every second Tuesday, and a quarter session for the county on the Tuesday following October 11th. Living, a vicarage in the archd. and dio. of Carlisle, rated at £12 6s. 3d. Patron, the bishop of Carlisle. The church—ded. to St Andrew—is a large and handsome edifice, containing many objects worthy of notice to the visitor. Here are places of worship for Scottish Seceders, Independents, Wesleyans, and Quakers; a good free school, charity school, and two Sunday schools. The town of Penrith is pleasantly situated in a fertile valley, within the district of Inglewood forest, and consists principally of one long street, well-paved and lighted; the houses are chiefly built of red freestone and roofed with slate. There are a good inn, news room, subscription and circulating libraries, and a house of correction built at the expense of the county in 1826. It is a place of considerable antiquity. At the conquest it was a royal franchise, and was subsequently claimed by the Scots and continued a long time in their possession, but being disputed by the English it was seized by Edward I., and was twice burned in the reigns of Edward III. and Richard II., when a strong fortress was erected to prevent further incursions of the Scots. It also suffered dreadfully by the plague at two different periods. Pop., in 1801, 3801; in 1831, 6059. A. P., £17,592.

PETERBOROUGH.

This ancient city is located within the liberty of Peterborough, co. of Northampton, but has separate jurisdiction. It is $81\frac{1}{2}$ m. N. by W. from London, and 44 m. N. by E. from Oxford.

Municipal Government.—The civil government is vested in the lord of the hundred and liberty of Peterborough, a custos rotulorum, magistrates appointed by royal authority, with powers equivalent to those of judges of assize, and a high bailiff, nominated by the dean and chapter as lords of the manor. Quarterly courts of session, and a court of record are held. The city sends two members to parliament. It is also one of the polling places for the members for the northern division of the county.

Trade, &c.—The trade of this place is chiefly in the transit of corn and malt, brought here in large quantities by means of the river Nene, which is not navigable for shipping, but boats pass to Northampton, and a packet boat sails hence to Wisbeach twice a week. The market is on Saturday. Fairs, July 9th and October 1st.

Ecclesiastical Affairs.—This city was anciently annexed to the dio. of Lincoln, from which it was separated at the dissolution, and erected into a distinct bishopric. The ecclesiastical establishment consists of the bishop, dean, sub-dean, archdeacon of Northampton, six prebendaries, four minor canons, chancellor, and registrar, all in the bishop's patronage except the deanery, of which the lord-chancellor is patron. The episcopal revenue is rated at £414 17s. 8d., the archdeaconry at £122 7s. 1d. The city consists of only one parish, viz. St John the Baptist. Living, a discharged vicarage in the archd. of Northampton and dio. of Peterborough, rated at £49. Patron, the bishop of the diocese. Church ded. to St John the Baptist. Pop., in 1801, 3449; in 1831, 5553. A. P., £11,647.

Buildings.—The venerable and spacious cathedral is partly in the Norman and partly in the Gothic style. It consists of a nave with aisles, a transept and choir. The magnificent western front is formed by a recessed portal of three lofty arches, surmounted by a rich gable. The extreme length of the edifice from E. to W. is 479 feet; the breadth of the W. front 156 feet; the height from the N.W. tower to the top of the spire 186 feet. Among the monuments contained in this cathedral are three for abbots of Peterborough of the 12th century. Catharine of Arragon was also interred here, and—near the spot—Mary queen of Scots, but the remains of the latter were subsequently removed to Westminster abbey. The town-hall was built in 1671, it is a neat edifice, and beneath it is a spacious market-place. The gaol and house of correction are both small buildings. A theatre was recently erected, which is opened a few weeks in summer.

Schools and Public Charities.—The free

grammar school, founded by Henry VIII., is under the control of the dean and chapter, for the education of 20 boys, who have the privilege of becoming candidates for five scholarships and a fellowship in St John's college, Cambridge. There is a well-endowed charity school, founded by T. Deacon, Esq., in 1721; also a national school upon an extensive plan. There is an infirmary, a dispensary, and other charitable institutions. The title of earl of Peterborough was bestowed by Charles I., on the family of Mordaunt.

PLYMOUTH,

A sea-port, borough, and market-town, having separate jurisdiction, but locally situated in Roborough hundred, co. of Devon, 43½ m. S.W. from Exeter, and 21½ m. W.S.W. from London. This place, it appears, at one time consisted of two small fishing stations, but owing to the convenience of its haven it rapidly attained to great importance, and is now one of the largest maritime towns in England. The principal harbours are the Sound, Sutton-Pool, the Hamoaze, Stonehouse-Pool, Barnn-Pool, and the Catwater.

Trade.—A very considerable trade in timber is carried on with North America and the Baltic, and an intercourse has been established with the West Indies. The coasting trade is chiefly with London, Newcastle, Newport—in Wales—and Bristol. The chief imports are coal, culm, corn, wine, and timber.

Municipal Government, &c.—The government of this borough is vested in a mayor, recorder, 12 aldermen, and 24 common-councillors, who hold courts of session after the four regular quarter days in each year. A court of records every Monday. It is designated an admiralty borough, and returns two members to parliament. The number of electors is about 3000.

Parishes, &c.—The town of Plymouth comprises two parishes, viz. St Andrew's, and King Charles the Martyr. The living of St Andrew's is a vicarage in the archd. of Totness and dio. of Exeter, rated at £12 15s. 5d. Patrons, in 1829, J. Hatchard, Esq., and others. The living of King Charles the Martyr is a vicarage in the archd. of Totness and dio. of Exeter, rated at £12 15s. 5d. Patron, in 1829, W. Carne, Esq. Here are places of worship for Independents, Baptists, Methodists, and Unitarians, a Roman Catholic chapel, and a Jews synagogue. The grammar school and charity schools are on an extensive scale. There are also alms houses, a seaman's hospital, and several other public charities and buildings. A commodious market-place was recently erected. The market is on Monday and Thursday. Fairs, Feb. 5th, and Oct. 2d. Pop., in 1801, 43,194; in 1831, 75,534. A. P., £192,547.

chorage in the entrance to the channel was much felt; the Sound at Plymouth, comprising the bays named Cawsand Bay, the Catwater, and Hamoaze, offered a suitable asylum to a great fleet returning from a cruise, and being one of the grand naval arsenals, could supply without delay every thing requisite to enable it to put to sea again; but, unfortunately, this road being wholly open and exposed to the ocean and S.W. wind, afforded, in its natural state, no protection whatever during those very storms which most frequently obliged our fleets to seek an asylum in it. It has, therefore, frequently happened that they have been obliged to run into Torbay, which is perfectly sheltered from the S.W.; but this bay had also great inconveniences: first, it is more to the E. than Plymouth, which is an important circumstance, because when the west wind is constant, it is very difficult for vessels to get out of the channel by tacking; for great fleets it is impossible. These serious inconveniences having long shown the necessity of converting Plymouth into a safe harbour, government at length resolved that something should be done, and various plans were proposed and discussed. To Lord Grey, when at the head of the naval administration, the first contemplation of this great national work is due; but to Mr Yorke belongs the merit of having adopted the plan, and caused it to be carried into execution, notwithstanding the forebodings of those who were hostile to it. His own sound judgment, however, backed by the opinion of Mr Rennie—the celebrated engineer, under whose guidance Waterloo Bridge was erected—gave him assurance of the propriety and of the successful issue of the undertaking. The quarries from which the stones used in the work were procured, are situated at Overton, on the eastern shore of Catwater; they lie under a surface of about 25 acres, and were purchased from the duke of Bedford for £10,000. These quarries consist of one vast mass of compact close-grained marble, many specimens of which are beautifully variegated; seams of clay, however, are interspersed through the rock, in which there are also large cavities, some empty and others partially filled with clay. These huge blocks of stone are conveyed from the quarries on trucks, along iron railways to the quays, and from thence into the holds of vessels, built expressly for the purpose. On their arrival over the line of the Breakwater, they are discharged from the trucks by means of what is called a typing-frame at the stern of the vessel, which falling like a trap-door, lets the stone into the sea. In this manner, a cargo of 16 trucks, or 80 tons, may be discharged in the space of 40 or 50 minutes. The breadth, or transverse section of this magnificent work, is upwards of 250 feet; the total length of the Breakwater is 5100 feet. The first stone was sunk on the 12th of August, 1812, and on the 31st of March, 1813, the Breakwater made its first appearance above the surface of the Sound at low water, spring-tide. At the conclusion of the year 1816, upwards of 1,000,000 tons had been deposited. The whole of the work above the line of low-water mark has been some time finished, and this splendid undertaking is proceeding steadily towards its completion. The fitness of this immense mound for the purpose for which it was intended, has been clearly proved by the manner in which it has withstood the attacks of the sea during so many stormy winters; never, except in one instance, having had a stone displaced during the most violent gales.

archd. of Dorset and dio. of Bristol, rated at £16 2s. 1d. Patron, the bishop of Winchester. Church ded. to St George. Here is a chapel for Wesleyan Methodists. This isle—or more properly peninsula—is situated opposite to Weymouth, and is about $4\frac{1}{2}$ m. long and 2 broad, and is literally a vast rock of freestone, but not barren. The herbage is good, and the arable land produces wheat, oats, and barley. At the south end are two lighthouses, and near to them a remarkable cave, from which a column of water rises like a fountain. Portland castle, together with that of Weymouth, was erected by Henry VIII., when he made a general fortification on the coast. This is a royal manor; the lands are ancient demesne, and the king's steward holds courts at Ladyday and Michaelmas. The Portland stone quarries, in the west of the island, are a great source of wealth to the proprietors, and are the chief source of employment to the labouring classes. Pop., in 1801, 1619; in 1881, 2670. A. P., £1,629.

PORTSDOWN, a hundred in Portsdown division, Southampton, containing 7 parishes.

PORTSEA (ISLAND OF), a tract of land in Portsdown hundred and division, co. of Southampton, nearly 16 m. in circumference; bounded east by Langston harbour; south by Spithead; west by Portsmouth; and north by a narrow channel, over which is a bridge connecting it to the mainland. The coasts of this island are defended by several forts and castles, the most important of which are Fort Cumberland, Southsea castle, and the works at Hilsea. The royal dockyard of Portsea is on a magnificent scale. The great basin comprehends an area of 33,000 square yards, communicating with several dry docks. A royal naval college was founded here in 1790, and a school of naval architecture was incorporated with it, 1816. The town comprises several well built streets, terraces, and crescents; the houses are well built, and chiefly inhabited by the more opulent families connected with Portsmouth. Living, a vicarage in the archd. and dio. of Winchester, rated at £12. Patron, Winchester college. Church ded. to St Mary. At the southern extremity of the burial ground is a large grave in which were interred several bodies picked up from the wreck of the Royal George in 1782, which sad catastrophe is recorded on a monument near the grave. This tract of land comprises the borough and seaport town of Portsmouth, with which the pop. is included, and in the franchise of which it participates.

PORTSMOUTH, a seaport, borough, and market-town, located in Portsdown hundred and division, co. of Southampton, but having separate jurisdiction. It is 18 m. S. by E. from Southampton, and 73 $\frac{1}{2}$ m. S.W. from London. The origin of this place is attributed to the decay of the ancient town of Portchester, occasioned by the gradual retreat of the sea, which destroyed the advantages of that town as a naval station. Portsmouth harbour is now superior to any in the kingdom; one of its many advantages is the spacious roadstead of Spithead, between Portsmouth and the isle of Wight, where 1000 ships of the line may ride securely. The municipal government is vested, agreeable to charter of Charles I., in a mayor, recorder, 12 aldermen, an indefinite number of burgesses, a town-clerk, and inferior officers. Quarterly sessions are held, a court of record for recovery of small debts, and an annual court-leet. This borough has regularly sent two members to parliament since the reign of Edward I. Under the old system the number of electors were only 50, it now exceeds 8000. The town is about $1\frac{1}{2}$ m. in circumference. The principal street extends south from the London road, and is nearly central, and a continuation of it is Broad-street, forming a line of communication with Spithead, the harbour, and Gosport. These streets contain the residences of the lieutenant-governor, the port-admiral, and other persons connected with maritime commerce. A new custom-house has also been erected. There are four guardhouses within the town. The garrison consists of 3 regiments of foot. Between Portsmouth and Portsea is an arsenal containing arms for 25,000 men. The foreign commerce of Portsmouth is confined to timber from the Baltic and eggs from France. The coasting trade is extensive. Packet boats sail hence daily for Southampton and the isle of Wight, and steam boats pass regularly between this and Plymouth and Havre de Grace. The living of Portsmouth is a vicarage in the archd. and dio. of Winchester, rated at £6 18s. 4d. Patron, Winchester college. The church—ded. to St Thomas of Canterbury—is a venerable structure, built in the reign of Henry III. There are several other places of worship in the suburbs belonging to the establishment, besides chapels for various dissenting bodies. A free grammar school was founded in 1789 by Dr Smith, for 50 boys. St Paul's school is newly instituted, and there are a national and Lancastrian schools, and various charitable bequests for the relief of the poor. The market is on Tuesday, Thursday, and Saturday. Fairs, July 10th and 14 days following, and July 26th. Pop., in 1801, 7839; in 1831, 8083.
